

Shakespeare's Hamlet Suits Imagination

By ROBERT WRIGHT
Whom do you consider the world's greatest chef? Shakespeare! What! William Shakespeare, a cook, don't be absurd. Have you ever tasted a dish that he created? Yes, I tried one of his masterpieces the other day. It was a concoction of rare ingredients skillfully blended in exact proportions according to a precise recipe. Once you have tasted it, you will appreciate the genius of its creator. What do you call this wonderful dish? One Dane Well-Done is my name for it. I can give you a rough outline of the recipe, for the major ingredients are: Meat—take one sensitive young Dane and let him soak up virtue, honesty, and integrity under the watchful eye of his royal father for twenty-odd years during which good education adds an edge to his keen mind, and you get a man. Sugar—add one very comely young maiden who is pure, innocent, and almost too good for this world to give the mixture a romantic flavor. Bitters—zest is obtained by mixing with the juice of a spineless woman, a queen whose only guide is passion. Watch her, for she has a tendency to taint the more ingredients, unless they are internally sound. Salt—add a young student who can be both honest and loyal, who has courage as well as strength to call him Hamlet, to add him to keep the final crusty from spoiling. Spice—add a mixture old grave-digger to give flavor and atmosphere to your stew. Garlic—add a host of conflicting and contrasting personalities to keep the plot simmering. Yeast—add one sexual degenerate who envies his brother's crown and hat, and you have the necessary yeast that ferments nothing but evil, and the mixture is complete. Next, stir up the ingredients or have the honored and respected king murdered! Keep the mixture in a covered pot or in an old crock and raise the temperature to the boiling point. This mixture should be watched carefully for two and a half hours. Does this become boring or tedious? Absolutely not, for it holds the observer's attention by its unusual and turbulent reactions. Allow this mixture to cool and soak, for this even its value is enhanced by sleeping on it. It does not become stale with age; instead it possesses the peculiarity of a mud becoming better the more it is chewed. I call this delicacy One Dane Well-Done, but Shakespeare chose to call it simply Hamlet—a superb dish in any language, in any land.

Prominent Clubs Spur Campus Life

By PAT THOMPSON

One of the most prominent groups on the campus is the Marsh Club. Gardner-Webb's Phi Beta Kappa troupe. This organization is a campus recognition for students who distinguish themselves by four qualities: leadership, scholarship, character, and service.

New members are appointed by the faculty and by the members of the club during the second semester of each year and are initiated solemnly. Election to membership in the Society is the supreme award for a well-rounded student. Only those who prove to the ideal qualities of a well-rounded student are eligible.

CLUBS' PURPOSE

The purpose of this organization is to stimulate scholarship, to develop character, to encourage leadership, and to create good fellowship. The club is directed by Dean W. E. Baldwin, a Phi Beta Kappa herself.

Ruth Borders and Zeb Moss, co-chief marshals, lead the active marshals in many activities on the campus. The officers include Zeb Moss, president, Sue Curlee, vice-president, and Grace Selvey, secretary and treasurer.

HOME EC GROUP

Another growing club on our campus is the Evelyn Lytton Home Economics Club. This club has various speakers who lecture on child care, personal care, designing, and fields of home economics. This club is under the leadership of Mrs. Carlyle Cornwell, director of the college Home Economics Department.

Anyone who is enrolled in the Home Economics Department or who is interested in home economics contacts with state and national home economists. This club holds its initiation service for new members in the Home Economics Department building. The simple but beautiful ceremony is conducted by candle light. This year the table was centered at one end of the room and covered with a white cloth. A lighted Betty Lamp was placed in the center with lighted white tapers on each side.

On Monday, Feb. 14, Mrs. W. L. Huskey, vice president, escorted the initiates into the room where they formed a semicircle around the table. The new members were presented for initiation.

The president, Ruth Borders, gave an interesting discussion on privileges and obligations of the Home Economics Club.

Ruth Dillard, secretary, explained the symbolism of the Betty Lamp, which is the symbol of home economics ideals.

The initiates gave the club pledge and then lighted their Betty Lamps. The president pinned on each girl measuring spoons tied with ribbons of the club colors, yellow and red, and extended to them a welcome.

does not require a major operation or specialist.

For the private citizen, arrangement is the same as any other clinic, with charges of a regular treatment fee.

Dr. Wyan Washburn, college physician, is head of the clinic, assisted by two trained nurses, Miss Wyan Washburn and Mrs. Jean Jolley, regular college nurse.

Floisae Slater, nurse-aide, will serve as an assistant. If work demands it, however, others will help Plans are to use pre-med students for as much training as possible.

In the future, a training course for laboratory technicians and doctor's secretaries may be offered.

Our health center leads N. C. junior college infirmaries which is actually a little hospital with a doctor and two nurses in attendance, offering full facilities for both the college and community. To teach the importance of and to maintain good health is the objective. Twenty-four hour service is available for students and people of this section.

The annual B.S.U. Christmas Banquet is scheduled for Monday evening, Dec. 19. Christmas caroling will follow, with the students singing to various parts of the community.

Campus Personality of the Month

Here at the beginning of America's winter sports giant, basketball, the thoughtful fan might grow so thoughtful as to remember the most cheerless organ of any basketball squad, the student manager.

Guard that man! Sink that ball! or yea, coach, you've come back! are three mediums through which the average fan extols the big five or six coaches. He is not so concerned for a coach who is not a student, but in victory or loss, little mention is ever made of the stalwart of the hardwood, that king of the towels, the student manager.

There are student managers, and there are student managers, and Gardner-Webb College, home of North Carolina's junior college Bulldogs, believes it has one of the best in the game. This conviction is no idle nomination, either. Head Coach Wayne Bradburn and Assistant Coach Norman Harris, both of whom have seen a year of sports on and off the court, call Bill Dodge, Miami, Florida, the best of the best. Dodge, the best football and basketball manager they have ever seen in operation. Dodge did a supreme job managing the G-W football squad this fall, also.

"Often it's a problem to keep equipment right on top and reliable boys to handle it, especially in a small school, but we have that and more in Dodge," Coach Bradburn contends.

Little did Dodge intend to manage a basketball team when he came to G-W last winter at the turn of the mid-term. All he was interested in was an education, and a chance to get out and put some of his salesmanship experiences to a test. High School at Andrew Jackson in Miami had always been with him a matter of attending classes until 12 noon, and then rushing to a wholesale cigar and tobacco company for his outside sales experience. The job was a "fortunate necessity," according to Bill.

He liked basketball at the Miami high, but never had time to play, and when he reached Gardner-Webb after dropping out of a crowded Florida State University at Tallahassee in 1948, he found there would be time to manage a sport he had never had time to play.

The average basketball fan knows no more about the duties of a student basketball manager than he does about Milton's "Paradise Lost," but alone "Retained" Offhand, the job looks colorful—trips to the four winds, sideline views of winter's giant sport, and sprinkles of the spotlight when it shines on heroes. Offhand, it is colorful. But for every minute of color and tingling sideline thrill, there are hours of drudgery and unending effort for a student manager.

The biggest responsibility for him rests in his custody of team equipment. He has 15 to 20 uniforms to be washed every week, and the same number of practice uniforms to keep shaped up. Pounds of socks have to be washed frequently. Arrangements for the room and board of visiting teams is often looked after by G-W's Manager Dodge. Gym equipment has to be maintained, etc., etc.

All the equipment is not inanimate. There are ankles to be taped and sore shoulders to be barked. Now and then Dodge is handed a letter to the coaches and managers of visiting teams, and offers good words to a prospective player. This latter type of work could be called "secular" in some leagues.

So, there you have it—from masseur to private secretary—all in one easy season. Did someone say easy? Move over, Dodge has a word for that—a word the name of all college basketball managers throughout this colossal gymnasium called U. S. A.
