because his descriptions of the innocence of the children and how it changes as they get older," freshman Rachel Younge said.

Kozol ended his speech by challenging the audience to be aware of how they can help those less fortunate than themselves.

"I believe that children are their own best advocates if we will only humble our own ears and listen to their words," he said.

Several UNCW professors use Kozol's books as supplementary materials in their courses. The education class "Teacher, School, and Society," taught by Dr. Maurice Martinez, reads Savage Inequalities. The books address the inequalities in poverty communities, especially those with minority populations.

"Jonathan Kozol gives us an in depth look at what needs yet to be done in the public schools of America," Martinez said.

The freshmen honors seminar classes also attended the lecture after reading portions of Kozol's work.

"There is so much interest in volunteerism and leadership among honors students," Dr. Kate Bruce, director of the honors program, said.

Many students had the opportunity to meet Kozol and discuss his works following the lecture. He warmly welcomed anyone to talk to him and get his or her book signed.

"Having him shake my hand and telling me that I will be a great teacher is one of the most inspiring things I will ever hear," freshman Evie Schulz said.

Kozol's lecture was part of the Leadership Center's Leadership Lecture Series, Building Characters by Design.

Shabazz named assistant Vice Chancellor for admissions

Last Wednesday, Dr. John Cavanaugh, provost and vice chancellor for academic affairs, announced the appointment of Roxie Shabazz as assistant vice chancellor for admissions. Shabazz, currently director of admissions at Spelman College, will join the UNCW staff later this fall.

"She is very well regarded nationally in the admissions profession," Cavanaugh said. "Her success in previous positions as well as her knowledge of this region impressed me. She has a lot of good ideas on how we can market ourselves better."

"We will be looking to her to generally raise the quality of our admissions operation, including a complete revision of our admissions material, and raise the whole level of service we provide to prospective students and their parents. We also expect her to help UNCW become more active in selecting the kind of freshman class we want, seeking out students with the characteristics we want to enroll here," he said.
