Offensive Or Defensive ?

President Kennedy has decided to allow defensive weapons to remain in Cuba. The question now is what constitutes a defensive or an offensive weapon. The average American, when he thinks of offensive weapons, usually mentally pictures long-range missiles, bomber planes, long-range artillery and so forth.

But are not all weapons of war really offensive in the final analysis? There is no weapon which does not go from one point or place to another, no matter whether it is an arrow from a bow, lead from a cartridge of some type, or a Polaris missile from a submarine.

A "defensive" weapon can very quickly and easily become an offensive one, if the situation and need arises. The machine gun emplacements which surround the U. S. Naval Base at Guantanamo are now defensive. Would not a shot from one of these guns fired into the base convert these defensive weapons into offensive weapons?

The United Nations has a special fund from which are allotted sums to countries to be used for internal improvements and developments. Recently nearly $1.25 million dollars was earmarked for agricultural developments in Cuba. The U. S. Contributes 40 per cent of this fund, while Russia contributes 15 per cent.

Again the U. S. seems to be carrying the heaviest part of the burden of a U. N. financial transaction. When the bill for the U. N.'s activities in the Congo was totalled, and it was learned that this was the final unbearable debt to the money-plagued U. N., President Kennedy proposed that the U. S. purchase millions of dollars worth of U. N. bonds to prevent this institution from toppling. The U. S. taxpayer could console himself by seeing more of his money going outside the States.

The U. N.'s allocation of this money for use in Cuba was not at all well received by the lawmakers in Washington. They feel, as certainly do most Americans, that to allow Cuba to strengthen herself agriculturally or in any other manner is a great mistake, since Cuba is definitely Communist. Although Castro at first proclaimed that his was not a Russian Communist leaning, events lately have certainly proved this to be quite untrue.
