Long interested in private higher education, he has given support to special programs at Union Theological Seminary, Bowman Gray School of Medicine, Queens College, and Montreat-Anderson College.

"We know the Board of Visitors will, under this new leadership, continue outstanding services to the College," commented St. Andrews President Ansley C. Moore. "Our various programs of institutional advancement will be presented to the Visitors from time to time."

Best-Dressed Coed Sought

The editorial staff of "The Lance" announces its second annual campus contest for St. Andrews Best Dressed College Girl. The contest is in cooperation with "Glamour Magazine's" "Ten Best-Dressed College Girls for 1968" contest.

Last year, St. Andrews' winner, Betty Tilley, was honored by "Glamour" as one of thirteen runner-ups in the 1967 contest.

"Glamour" poses ten guideline rules in their selection of the best-dressed girls:

- 1) A clear understanding of her fashion type.
- 2) A workable wardrobe plan.
- 3) A suitable campus look.
- 4) Appropriate look for campus occasions.
- 5) Individuality in her use of colors, accessories.
- 6) Imagination in managing a clothes budget.
- 7) Good grooming, not just neat, but impeccable.
- 8) Clean, shining, well-kept hair.
- 9) Deft use of make-up.
- 10) Good figure, beautiful posture.

The campus competition will again be run on a dormitory nomination basis. Each dorm will be asked to submit two nominations by Monday, February 12. All nominations will be presented on a ballot to the student body Wednesday, February 14. A majority vote is not necessary, the nominee receiving the most votes will be the campus representative for "Glamour Magazine's" contest.

Joyner Furnishes Lead Article For "Southern Review"

Professor Charles W. Joyner has the lead article in the latest edition of Southern Humanities Review. This quarterly published at Auburn University, features "Southern Folklore as a Key to Southern Identity."

Folksongs and other sources of Southern folklore reveal that racial integration on the "folk level of human communication" has been taking place for 300 years, reports Charles W. Joyner, St. Andrews Presbyterian College history professor, in the Southern Humanities Review.

Prof. Joyner traces the paths and patterns of Southern folklore from its beginnings in the 17th century to the present day. He indicates that Southern folklore began when "thrown together in a fierce land, folk from West Africa and from the British Isles merged their tunes, tales and styles." Because the Negro was deliberately separated from other members of his tribe shortly after his arrival in America, the influence of his African culture was lost as his folklore developed. It became American and was strongly influenced by European traditions.

The well-known Brer Rabbit, for example, descended from German and French folklore, Prof. Joyner reports. He also traces the source for the famed John Henry, "that steel-drivin' man," to show that the ballad was a joint product of Negro and white singers. "Its content is the legend of the brave black man who died with his hammer in his hand, but its tune is rooted in a Scottish melody, and its devices are those of Medieval English and Scottish balladry," Prof. Joyner writes.

The St. Andrews scholar, a native of South Carolina, has collected folksongs firsthand with a tape recorder from several Southern regions.

Prof. Joyner claims that Southern Spirituals also combine elements of two racial groups. "Comparison of black and white Spirituals reveals many exchanges of melody, rhythm, and lyric," he states. He also traces the development and influence of blues songs, minstrel songs, and jazz to reinforce the evidence of interrelationships.

"Social, economic and racial barriers that separated Southerners were bypassed by music and converted into positive forces of mutual appreciation," Prof. Joyner reports. In his concluding paragraph, he states "this mixing of cultural heritage is more responsible than any other single factor for the extraordinary richness of the Southern folk heritage."
