NEWS OF HEALTH

The World Health Organization estimates that 20 percent of the world's middle-aged population suffers from high blood pressure. For black adults in America, the proportion is much higher—as many as one in three according to some studies.

High blood pressure is aptly known as the "silent killer," because its symptoms are often not obvious to the individual. Nonetheless, high blood pressure is the most common chronic disease treated by physicians in the black community. It is ten times more likely to cause fatal strokes, heart disease or kidney disease than it is among middle-aged whites.

Heart specialists at the Squibb Institute for Medical Research recommend that black men and women over 40 should have their blood pressure checked once a year, particularly if there is a family history of high blood pressure, stroke, heart attack or kidney disease, or if the individual has frequent headaches or dizziness, which might indicate the presence of high blood pressure.

High blood pressure, once diagnosed, can be controlled through exercise, diet or daily medication, as prescribed by a physician.

A new weapon has been devised to combat the "silent killer" of a large number of minority-group Americans.

drug therapies may now be treated by doctors with a drug called Capoten, a compound developed at The Squibb Institute. Administered orally, it is a new weapon with which the physician can help patients fight "the silent killer."

Capoten is not a cure, and like previous drugs to treat high blood pressure it must be taken regularly to do its unique work properly. But it is considered a giant step forward in controlling hypertension, particularly for long-term treatment of severe cases.

HELP WANTED: THE PEACE CORPS

Good news for minorities is that the Peace Corps, now celebrating its twentieth year, has launched a nationwide recruitment effort targeting minority Americans to meet a goal of increased participation.

Prompted by recent global statistics which indicate that one quarter of the world's population—four billion people—live out their lives in a state of pervasive poverty, the Peace Corps has assumed a pivotal role in calling for aggressive involvement by U.S. citizens in its recruitment campaign. The Peace Corps is the only U.S. agency which assigns its people to live and work among communities at the level of local workers in developing nations.

Described as "practical idealists," Peace Corps volunteers work on fundamental, but vital projects in nearly 60 countries throughout the world. Working alongside the people they hope to serve, these volunteers share in the daily struggles of the poor, hungry and sick to help increase knowledge and skills, economic development, income, housing, energy resources and community services.

One recruitment specialist, when asked to describe the types of people the Peace Corps aims to attract commented, "We need people with practical experience and a willingness to serve. While a college degree is preferable, it is not mandatory." All volunteers receive eight to 12 weeks of intensive training.

During training, volunteers learn the language of the community they will serve, study the culture and its customs and develop basic skills in the areas of health, education and energy. Persons with skills in the areas of agriculture, math/science, health, forestry, architecture, and business administration, are being requested by the governments of developing nations to help alleviate the plight of the poor.

Peace Corps volunteers, although non-salaried, receive a monthly living allowance, comparable to the standards of living in the communities they will serve. Housing is oftentimes provided by the host government, while the allowance is furnished primarily to cover the costs of food, clothing and basic needs.

In addition, volunteers receive a re-adjustment payment of $125 for each month of service upon their return to the U.S.—usually after two years. Many volunteers however, elect to extend their service.

The benefits, say some returned volunteers, are not measurable in financial gain, but in experience, adaptable to almost any career. The Peace Corps has a toll free number for persons interested in volunteer service. Call (800) 424-8580 to find about "the toughest job you'll ever love."
