Library to Move To New Building

By Dollye Evans

A "great event" is taking place on the campus of Winston-Salem State College. Books are beginning to stroll — by carrier, human and machine — from the old library to the new C. G. O'Kelly Library, pending the arrival of furniture and depending on the weather. Mrs. Lucy Bradshaw, head librarian (since 1963), is busy planning just how this will be done.

"The opening date for the C. G. O'Kelly Library has been set tentatively for Sept. 1," Mrs. Bradshaw said. "Just how the moving process will be done is not known."

A new classroom building will open at the beginning of the school term in September. It will be officially dedicated on campus in March.

The building will be for all education classes. Currently most education classes are held in Carolina Hall with others in Eller Hall and Hill Hall. The faculty offices are scattered in various places. All the faculty offices will be in the new building.

One room will be a special laboratory for reading.

The building will have 16 classrooms and 30 faculty offices.

"There will be no new subjects added to the curriculum," said President Kenneth R. Williams.
