Open Sesame!

By William S. Fulton
Editor-In-Chief

Many of the students and faculty members of Winston-Salem State University would like to imagine that a simple command, "Open Sesame," could cause the new Communications Building to become magically completed and opened for business.

This is the atmosphere that surrounds the new building on campus. The Communications Building was formerly scheduled to open for the 1978 Fall Semester. Due to hold ups in construction, it is now tentatively scheduled to open for the Spring Semester of 1979.

The new building promises to provide WSSU students with more in-depth training and experience in the field of mass-media communication. The major emphasis of the Communication Arts program will be radio/television and journalism/public relations. Some of the specialized areas of the complex will be a television studio, an FM radio station, a 260-seat multi-media lecture room, a 45-station language and speech laboratory, audio-visual classrooms, and individualized areas for study.

The spring semester should also see the addition of courses in communication. Next semester the department of Communication Arts tentatively plans courses in Fundamentals of Journalism, Introduction to Broadcasting, and Introduction to Mass Communication.
