It has become almost traditional for students to complain about the food service here in our dining hall. Perhaps because of the change from Mama's home cooked meals to institutional food services who don't add all the love that Mom does, and perhaps because it really is bad. Most students keep a supply of goodies on hand in case of the midnight munchies. It's a long time between dinner and bedtime or breakfast. Some can afford to eat out (it must be nice). However, for us who are on a budget, here is a comparative list of common items and their prices at each location.

ROTC Spaces Still Available

By News Argus Staff

"Freshmen week is usually so hectic that it's a wonder that students manage to get signed up for their classes." That's the way one professor at Winston-Salem State University summed up the busy, early days of the new students.

Major Floyd Griffin, ROTC Coordinator at WSSU agrees. "The students are so busy finding out about classes, meeting each other, attending orientation sessions, and going to the numerous social functions that we aren't surprised that many of them don't get curious about Army ROTC until a few months later."

That, according to Major Griffin, is one of the reasons the local Army ROTC

unit has a mid-term enrollment program. "By that time," Major Griffin said, "the students have had an opportunity to observe ROTC in action on the campus; to meet some of the cadets; and, to decide whether they would like to enroll."

So far, 160 have pre-registered in Army ROTC at mid-term and others have expressed interest in the program. "One of the most important things about the mid-term enrollment process," Major Griffin added, "is that it keeps the doors open for students who just don't have the time in the early days of student life to find out about us, even though we stay very visible.

In other words, it isn't too late and they still have the opportunity to enroll in Army ROTC."

Sambos Awards Grant

Winston-Salem State University has received a grant from Sambo's Restaurants, Inc. to establish the Sam D. Battistone Lecture Series.

The series, named for the past-president and chief executive officer of Sambo's Restaurants, is designed to explore the free enterprise system and its relationship to the minority community. The lecture series will begin in February and will present lecturers from various walks of life -- public service, academic, communications, business, clergy and other fields.

In announcing the grant, James E. Mack, president of B&C Associate of High Point, consultant to the restaurant chain, said the new series is intended to focus on the central issues of public and private policy in contemporary America. It is hoped also that the lectures will analyze constructive solutions to problems relative to minority businesses.
