

Students Teachers Speak Out

By Natasha Carlton

Several seniors are doing their student teaching this semester. It means waking up early in the morning and staying up late at night preparing a lesson plan for the next day's activities.

Student teaching requires a lot of patience. All children will not grasp words of wisdom the first time. However, there are few who cannot be reached by patience and understanding. Some student teachers have found that teaching is a task that must be taken seriously. They realize that their desire to teach will have a great impact on the future leaders of America.

Wanda White is a student teacher at Glenn High School in Kernersville. She teaches 10th grade English. "I feel that high school is the time when people become most influenced," said White. For this reason, she has decided to teach on the high school level. After she graduates from Winston Salem State University, she plans to attend Iowa State University and receive a M.A..

Patrice Fletcher is also a senior doing her student teaching. Her area of concentration is Business Education. Her future plans include obtaining a teaching job in Atlanta.

Jessica Harris found that there is a lot of apathy in the school system. She feels that the students are not taking their education seriously. Harris has been accepted at the University of Delaware where she plans to study English.
