College students are not immune to domestic violence.

To address some of the issues of domestic violence, the Kappa Lambda Chapter of Kappa Kappa Psi National Honorary Fraternity presented the seminar, Runaway Love-Domestic Violence Prevention,

The program featured seminar speaker Sylvester Reed.

A case manager and victim advocate at Family Services Inc. of Winston-Salem, Reed deals with domestic violence issues for his clients.

He also facilitates groups for men and teenagers and oversees a program called Strong Fathers, a collaboration with the Department of Social Services focusing on domestic violence.

"The main goal of the seminar was to share domestic violence, abuse and ways to prevent them," Reed said.

The U.S. Department of Justice and the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence show an increasingly large number of incidents amongst college and university students

According to NCADV, 42 percent of reported campus stalkers are boyfriends or ex-boyfriends. About half of all reported rape cases in the United States involve victims 18 and under.

About 71 percent of rape victims knew their offender, and 60 percent of rapes on college campuses occur between casual or steady partners.

Those who are involved in violent or abusive relationships may face unique obstacles in accessing services to escape from them.

Reed said that domestic violence is a disease.

"With Valentine's Day coming up, a lot of people don't tional abuse from their partner. understand just because you take one time out of the year to show somebody love that the stuff you do throughout the year is going to be forgiven," said Darius Cureton, the chapter's adviser.

Reed's lecture "Love Shouldn't Hurt" focused on types of abuse and the ways to avoid situations dealing with

Domestic violence is not limited to pushing or hitting,

"'If I didn't hit her in the face, it's not domestic violence' is the most common phrase I hear most," Reed said.

"Physical abuse is easy. Any woman can try to fight back but it all comes down to power and control, this is what men

According to Reed, four million women nationwide are physically abused each year and many more suffer emo-

In approximately five percent of the cases, men are the victims of violence and abuse. He said that a person being abused and criticized by a partner often feels afraid, isolated, depressed and in need of support.

Although the seminar had a low number in attendance, that did not seem to bother the chapter adviser.

"I wasn't particularly disappointed in the low number of students that attended that seminar because many enrichment and development programs on campus, at least from what I know, boast low numbers," Cureton said.

Cureton also said that programming focused on sex and relationships seem to attract the most students.

"When we had the safe sex seminar back in September, we had just under 100 students," Cureton said.

Runaway Love was the third installment of the Red Carnation seminar series.

The first two seminars "Safe Sex at WSSU" and "Meeting WSSU Deadlines" took place during the fall semester.

The Red Carnation is a series of workshops that Kappa Kappa Psi hosts three or four times a year.

The workshops were initially planned for the Red Sea of Sound members, but the fraternity opened the seminars to all students.

Joseph said this is a great opportunity for students to sharpen their copy editing skills and see more of their own and their peer's content published.

'Interested student editors are allowed to contribute to whichever section they desire," Joseph said.

"This change will ensure that the voices of all HBCUs will be represented on BCW, as well as allow BCW to publish more content more quickly."

Since 2002, several institutions and organizations including the FAMU Foundation, National Association of Black Journalists and North Carolina A&T Foundation have administered Black College Wire.
