Smoke Signals Editor Visualizes Final Edition

By BECKIE WORKMAN

It is my deepest pleasure to stories. visualize the edition twelve of volume six "Smoke Signals" finalized. Thus, looking back I feel as if my goals have in some way been completed. At times the editorship of this student newspaper has brought me my share of griefs. I knew that I must continue. I am not a weak person, therefore I had to follow my convictions. No one can please everyone at all times. Realizing this fact along with admitting I make mistakes was one of my greatest accomplishments, which placed me one step ahead of many others.

A legion of thanks and appreciation I wish to extend to Dean Clayton Lewis, whom has offered suggestions and help to me uncountable times during my two years at Chowan. This man should be appreciated for his active life with the students. He is observed attending student activities. I wish to concur a suggestion which I think will be an aid to the student newspaper next year. All clubs and organizations should have their elected reporter submit his reports to the "Smoke Signals". This should be a vital part of his job. Also in sports, a person, who is knowledgeable of sport terminology, should be asked to record games for the paper. I feel that this step will fulfill a need of communication, which is for the purpose of success in any organization, school, or sport. The lack of communication is a major problem which holds back compromises at Chowan College.

Take a look at an editorial I wrote concerning the cafeteria food. My fiance gave that dish of green beans to Bill Clark. What was his reaction? He took the beans, not offering another nothing! Had this student been a faculty member, or an older visiting adult, what would the response have been? Probably: "Sorry, sir. I'll have you another numerous students who con-tributed from time to time. possible." There are heaps of other incidents, not involving the cafeteria. Why can't the students be respected, as much as any newspaper. The more varied, the other person? We are all equal created by God. Everyone should be respected whether he is twelve or thirty-one, no matter what position he holds.

I also want to mention how I feel on another incident. How an innocent embrace or kiss can bring evil thoughts to a few individuals is beyond my knowledge. One should not care what "such" people think about him. For "such" opinions are not worth a drop in a "bottomless" bucket to one's eternal life. A person knows who he is. He cannot please everyone, and it is needless to try. One knows who is important to him. These people will not make preconceived misconceptions. Strange things have been happening at Parker Hall these past few weeks. Strange but not unusual because most of the residents have become accustomed to them. To what these things can be attributed is not known. Many rumors are floating around the dorm. Speaking of floating, the idea of a ghost is quite evident in the hushed discussions of the suject in the dorms.

By RICHARD LAYMAN

Crisp and bright with color of gold Many forgotten leaves growing old. Soft and warm autumn breeze Rustling softly through the trees.

A quiet path through the park So cool and shady, even dark. Wooden benches made for rest Enjoying nature at its best.

Two people walking down the path Wondering why must they live in the past. Wishing they could do what they please Just like the golden leaves.

Literary Musings

By PROF. ROBERT G. MULDER

The part of the world I know is not yet ready for Forth Into Night, a spellbinding novel by Gordon Merrick. Nor was our side of the globe ready for his first two novels, The Lord Won't Mind and One for the Gods, yet these seemed to have done all right for Merrick, who writes exclusively for Avon Books.

Choosing 1960 as the time of his most recent novel, Merrick uses a small tranquil Greek island as his setting. Other than a few mentioned natives, he stocks the island with an array of perhaps strange but interesting people: painters, writers, sculptors, alcholics, and dope enthusiasts.

As most good novels do, this one catches the reader's interest in the first few pages (This one has no partchapter divisions.) and forces him along until the 348 pages have been read. An unheard-of occurrence hits the village when George Leighton is robbed of two thousand dollars. Much of the action of this novel hangs upon the robbery framework, and the involvments of other inhabitants of the island are effected by Leighton's lost money, yet this novel is far more than a mystery

Forth into Night is basically a story of people trying to find and hold their own happiness. When the book ends, they seem to have succeeded to a great degree, even the possible exception who chooses to end his life and to join the gods.

George and Sarah Leighton, himself a distinguished American writer, and their 17-year old son Jeff find their tiny Greek island a paradise. There are enough of their kind of people to make life exciting, servants are cheap, and sun and sand are plentiful. Their many summers here have made them feel secure and respect for the Leightons is abundant.

Their only rivals in permanence and ownership are the Mills-Martins, a unique arrangement of two men, one woman, and two children. Charlie and Peter share one woman, Martin, each having had a child by her. Their situation is seemingly perfect and happiness abounds at every turn — no questions about the relationship are asked by islanders or visitors. Each child knows his separate father and they happily share the same mother.

Joe Peterson, a young student of theology and connoisseur of strong drink, also loses some money which he suspects has been stolen. He and George never blame any of their friends but places the finger of suspicion toward an islander named Costa. During the time justice as making may with Costa, George's son Jeff is seeking to insure his friendship with Dimitri, local bar owner and semi-mystery to the law. As it turns out, Jeff had stolen his father's money, gave it to Dimitri to make a big dope purchase, and failed to replace the money before it was discovered missing

Before the money can be replaced, Jeff has placed himself in a compromising position with Dimitri, a situation which expands also to Mike Thornton, a successful author visiting the Leightons, and to Charlie and Peter, who seriously try to help the boy understand himself. Not being able to accept what he learns about himself, Jeff seeks other avenues of escape. When the mystery of the missing money is solved, Jeff establishes a right relationship with his father, says his good-byes to Charlie Mills-Martin, and chooses to join the Greek gods he adores by jumping from a high cliff.

His death shocks the village, but the reader is left to speculate upon his parents' and closest friends' reaction. His bloody torn body is found on a rock above the sea, "his upturned eyes staring at the sky, a terrible smile on his face." The village does survive the tragedy just as it weathers the earthquakes which occur periodically,...c'est live!

Merrick is a powerful writer, dealing with many subjects which may be taboo in Good Housekeeping circles but treating them with tenderness and understanding. Those who have read his trilogy of novels will surely want to read the fourth - whenever he writes this one.
