Four out of each ten accidents happen while the injured person is handling something. Maybe a sprained back is the result of moving a case, or a burned hand the result of moving a hot object. And accidents at Adams-Millis follow the pattern. Since last AMCO NEWS, another printing machine operator reached for an envelope in the printing machine while the machine was running. The envelope pulled her hand into the gear of the machine, causing lacerations which required six stitches.

While trying to activate the clutch of a coating machine, an operator's hand was mashed in the gears.

Two disk coaters dropped disks which they were removing from the oven. One operator was injured as a result of the disk being hot, the other needed help but did not ask for it.

A boarder failed to recognize that one of the socks was wet and transmitted the heat more freely, resulting in a burn.

And, then, there was the operator who reached too far across the table to pick up a disk and sprained his back. Get in a proper position while lifting.

A warehouseman was walking toward a case of yarn. He was not looking where he was walking and walked against a guard rail that was not in proper position. Keep a sharp lookout where you walk.

Remember, get a good grasp on things you handle and look where you go when you move those articles.
