begins to show her his hoarded treasure and then offers it all to her if she will become his wife. She will not have a cent on these terms, telling him that she does not and cannot love him. He refuses the loan and sends her away, but ere she had gone many yards he repents his steps and jumping upon his pony overtakes her and gives her the gold, saying that she might marry whom she would.

Jeanie then gets herself in readiness and leaving a neighbor in charge of the home starts upon her long journey and on foot, to London.

RUSKIN AS A WRITER.

Ruskin's style we might say is a charming mixture of sublimity, enthusiasm, and good English commonsense. Ruskin does not have much reserve either in his writing or thinking, but he has just about every thing else. He has purity, elasticity, dramatic force, wit, passion, imagination and nobility. He writes about art, history, science, theology, education, economy, poetry, agriculture and many other subjects.

Ruskin is a musical, eloquent prose writer. He plays the prose lyre and strikes every infinite note with power and melody, that inspires the very musical soul of man. His writing is art expressed in words.

Alliteration and assonance, adjectives in description, antithesis in argument, and climax with dramatic force he used with very much power.

His sentences are rhythmical and full of music, his thoughts excellent, his style unsurpassed. He is clear, simple and charming in his manner of expression.

His prose is marked by two styles, a dramatic style, vehement, rhetorical, and full of imagery, such as we find in "Modern Painters," and "Seven Lamps." Then, too, he has a more moderate style, found in "Fors Clavigera." Melody and rhythm, strength and earnestness characterize his writing. There is symmetry and rhythm in his sentence structure. One only has to read the beautiful lines found in the preface to "The Crown of Wild Olive" to understand something of the beauty of this great writer.

"No clearer or diviner waters ever sang with constant lips of the hand which giveth rain from heaven; no pastures ever lightened in springtime with more passionate blossoming etc."

Musical, sublime, eloquent and full of inspiration. Art in words.

—Parenthood carries its anxieties all through life, and the older the parent the deeper becomes the solicitude. A New Jersey father celebrated his one hundred and first birthday recently, and when congratulated on his long life and good health, said that the only thing that troubled him was the poor health of his seventy-six year old son. But, without anxiety and solicitude comes little happiness in this life.
