The distributor, said, "When I went to Long Student Center, I had the papers bound. Then, this guy walked in and said he needed to take two stacks to Alamance, but to keep them bound. I assumed that he worked for The Pendulum, so I grabbed some unbound papers and left."

Meanwhile, Glenn stayed there. "I just thought he was another person hanging around," Glenn said. "Long Student Center is always full of people coming and going."

While no suspects have been identified in the case, according to the Oct. 4 article in the Times-News, two or three young men were spotted at Long Student Center later that afternoon. Also, a small gray car was seen at the Fine Arts Center during this time and it could have been used to carry the papers away.

A preliminary police report was filed with the Elon College Police Department at approximately 7 p.m. Thursday night and the final police report was completed Monday Oct. 7. As for the value of the stolen papers, in the Oct. 4 Times-News article, Deborah Durkee, editor of The Pendulum, estimates the loss to be at least $500.

With details still sketchy, The Pendulum is taking precautions to keep this from recurring. The paper is currently looking at ways to change distribution practices.

Although the theft has been controversial, Deborah Durkee believes that, "This is going to make people want to read the paper more." However, the disappointment prevails.

The people who work for The Pendulum dedicate themselves and their time to making the paper successful. This was especially disappointing because the Oct. 3 issue was the first 16-page edition.

Glenn summarized it best when he said, "The composition of the paper is a team effort and it's very discouraging because we were all proud of it. At least I know I was."

Herlihy

Ingle called The Pendulum Sept. 27, the day after Herlihy's story appeared and said he was "moved by (Herlihy's) story."

Ingle raised $2,000 through the Alamance County Law Enforcement Officers' Association and the local chapter of Drug Abuse Resistance Education, according to the Times-News.

Herlihy decided she had lost too much time to be able to get the A's and B's she wanted, so she declined the offer to return for the fall, she said.

When The Pendulum spoke to Herlihy on Wednesday morning, she was not ready to make a statement.

"I wanted to hear whether I could use the money for spring," she said.

According to the Times-News, Burlington patrolman Steve Foust of the Law Enforcement Officers' Association said the offer is still good for the spring.

Joel Speckhard, director of financial planning at Elon, said he had also been waiting to hear if the money would be offered for spring.

"If (Herlihy) decided to come back in the winter, instead of our normal way of tying winter (fees) to fall term, we would tie it to spring," Speckhard said.

Speckhard phoned Herlihy once he verified that the offer of funds is still good for the spring semester.

"I wished things could have happened sooner so I could have made it back for the fall semester," Herlihy said.

Herlihy's emotions have been in a turmoil and she isn't sure how she feels about things right now, she said.

"It been a lot to deal with," Herlihy said.

to avoid driving after they have been drinking.

"A lot of the officers have noticed occasions where groups of students are together and they have a designated driver to make sure that they all arrive home safely," Ingle said. "I think that students are really becoming aware of the dangers involved in drunk driving and they are really being responsible, which is commendable."

"Next week is Alcohol Awareness Week and one of the issues which will be covered in the week's events is drunk driving.

We will have Assistant District Attorney Bob Martin at Elon to speak on the subject and at college coffee we will have a booth displaying safe break kits," Patterson said.

"Alcohol-related accidents are statistically the number one cause of death for college students," Patterson said. "The college is aware of students who are arrested for driving while impaired. All students who are arrested are called into our office and we look to see if there is a problem or an addiction. We will focus on the issue during alcohol awareness week. We are trying to continue decreasing the numbers."
