Students question campus safety after string of assaults

While there have been three assaults on campus in the past two weeks, there is no reason to panic, according to administration officials.

On Nov. 10, a little after 6 p.m., a female student was attacked from behind as she crossed the intramural fields toward the Danieley Center Commons. She was able to get away and went immediately to her room where she reported the incident. The student was not harmed during the attack.

While this incident seemed to be a random attack and has caused concern among students, there have been other recent assaults also reported to campus police.

On Nov. 7, a female student was the victim of an assault near Staley Hall. The victim was able to get away from the assailant and was not injured in the incident.

This incident is not the first incident that has happened to this student on campus this year, and campus security officials feel that the two attacks on this person are by the same individual, and that the individual does not appear to be a threat to any other student at the present time.

Campus Police and Security officials declined further comment, as the investigation is pending.

In the early morning hours of Nov. 14, a male was assaulted at the Danieley Center Apartments during a group altercation.

According to Director of Campus Security Allen Poe, the incident remains under investigation and no arrests have been made.

Assistant Dean of Students John Barnhill said that while each incident is a concern to the college, they are in no way related and should not serve to cause a panic amongst the student body. "These recent incidents are not an epidemic," he said.

With the addition of two new security officers, and one more officer to be added to the staff, Campus Security is increasing security patrols between Moseley Center and Danieley Center partly in response to the Nov. 10 incident.

According to Vice-President of Student Life and Dean of Students Smith Jackson, the college has been in the process of adding security at night for some time.

The new security personnel will drive a Cushman vehicle with an eight person capacity. It will not only be used for patrol, but will also operate along the intramural path at night.
