

Construction progresses on campus

A wire fence encloses the vacant Carlton Building, cement, dirt and workers surround a marked-off area near McMichael Science Center and a barren field sits adjacent to Rhodes Stadium.

The signs of construction can be seen throughout the campus as Elon begins building new residence halls, renovating an academic building and constructing the Irwin Belk Track, all due for completion by the fall 2002.

These new projects are included in the "New Century at Elon" plan, which calls for increased residence hall, arts and science space. This plan supersedes the "Elon Vision" project, which funded the construction of the most recent additions to Elon such as the Carol Grotnes Belk Library in 2000.

Part of this long range plan to build up Elon's campus in the next seven to eight years includes the building of the Academic Village. The $2.7 million facility will be located south of the McMichael Science Center and will contain residence halls, faculty apartments and teaching space. Two of the eight pavilions will be completed by August 2002. The pavilions will each house 22 students and one faculty member in each building.

According to construction manager Neil Bromilow, the pavilions will be theme oriented, "which would lend itself to a full immersion experience for students."

"This will be a unique living and learning environment for students to live with other students committed to the same academic pursuits and will also provide a phenomenal experience to live in the same building as a faculty member," said Assistant Dean of Students and Director of Residence Life David Blackman.

Although the Academic Village may be useful to some students, sophomore Patrick Griffin said that other students might not benefit from this type of living arrangement. Griffin said that the current residence halls are "like your own little secluded area away from classes where you don't have to deal with academics."

Freshman Rachel Tippett, however, said that an academic village "forms more of a community and you get to know professors even more than you would in just a normal classroom setting."
