by the Editors

Pardon us for being journalistic right away, but we have long been aware of the sad fact that the Campus Crier has no definite editorial policy... or any other policy, for that matter. This situation hasn't bothered most of our readers, but it has led some writers to believe they can have anything printed in the Crier. In order to correct this misconception, we now offer the following statement of policies:

"Oh, yes," says the reader, "you defend Motherhood and the American flag!"

No, we leave that to the Maroon and Gold. Because we are a student government publication, our policy is to provide an outlet for student opinions and ideas, even if they conflict with those of the administration or the faculty. Unfortunately, in past years the Crier has projected a negative image. As one person told us: "I hate to read it because it's always complaining about something." This criticism is valid, but the image will be hard to change—happy and contented students usually won't bother to write for the Crier. However, we will always accept student complaints if they are intelligent and justifiable. And there is always room in the Crier for an informal essay or humorous article, if they are in good taste.

VARIETY will be the key word for future issues, with more features appealing (we hope) to a wider audience. We'll do whatever possible to improve the Campus Crier, but we must depend on student contributions. In other words, the Crier can be as good as YOU want it to be.

A WORD ABOUT HOMECOMING: For those poor souls who complain about the lack of beautiful girls on campus, we offer next week's special election: for Homecoming Queen as proof to the contrary. Besides being the only election around here which arouses any interest, it serves to remind us that Elon is definitely not second-rate in the Pretty Girl department. We hope that the Board of Elections counts the ballots more accurately than they did last year, when one position on the Queen's Court was awarded to the wrong contestant through a miscount.
