Educator Says Universities Have Given-In

Chicago, Ill. (I.P.) - Universities are giving in to student protest movements at the cost of intellectual achievement and excellence, according to Philip B. Kurland, Professor of Law at the University of Chicago.

In an address entitled "The New American University," Kurland said that too few students, faculty, and university administrators are willing to "stand up and fight against perversions" of the movement: politicization, egalitarianism, and the rejection of reason.

"Those university presidents," he said, "who are enjoying the peace that has descended on campuses during this academic year might recognize that it has been bought at the price of surrender."

Kurland said universities exercised little, if any, political power, although some faculty members "have individually played important political roles." He added that politics on campus hindered research and teaching for both students and faculty.

Speaking of many universities' recent activities to use their resources to improve the social climate of their neighborhoods -- often in response to student protests, he said:

"These are certainly worthy goals (of social improvement). But even the total resources of the universities are inadequate to these ends. Any partial commitment of university resources to these goals means that they have to be taken from the other functions that a university performs, essentially the gathering and communication of knowledge by those best able to make the discoveries and those best able to utilize them."
