

The Doctor's Bag

By Arnold Werner, M.D.
Copyright, 1973

Question: While walking along a trail in a park, I was attacked and raped. Fortunately, before too much happened, some people came up the trail and my unknown assailant fled. His penis did not penetrate very far and due to a lack of time, no semen was released.

A few days after this happened, a white vaginal discharge appeared and there seemed to be some irritation inside. There is a slight possibility that a small amount of dirt could have entered the vagina. Could this discharge be the result of gonorrhoea or a related disease? Or is it just an infection from possible presence of dirt? I have told no one of this incident, and I am under a great deal of stress to find the answers to my questions. This incident happened a few months ago, and the discharge has been with me since that time.

Answer: Following sexual assault by an unknown man, a woman should always visit a physician as soon as possible. Appropriate treatment should pay attention to the psychological state of the victim and in addition should include a careful examination for infection and other damage. Venereal disease definitely can be transmitted in the type of situation you describe. If ejaculation did occur, and if there is any chance of pregnancy resulting, the use of appropriate hormones to prevent such pregnancy is also indicated. The likelihood of dirt entering the vagina and causing an infection is small. However, some irritation could have resulted and this could produce a vaginal discharge. At this time you still should see a physician for an examination.

Although the legal investigation of rape may have a number of primitive and harsh aspects to it, I urge women to report such incidents to the police immediately. While some unenlightened police and courts may make the victim feel as if she is the accused, many agencies are making a strenuous attempt to deal kindly and discretely with the victim. In any case, the victim of such a crime owes it to all of us to help apprehend the rapist.

Question: I am up against a problem. In the last year I acquired a 35mm camera and I like to photograph many varied things including animals, scenery, places, events, etc. But, after observing various publications I naturally wanted to try my hand on nude and semi-nude women. I know many girls and carry on sexual activities with all of them. But, when I mention or bring out my camera, they are all turned off. Why is this and what, if anything, can I do to overcome their hesitancy?

Answer: Some letters just naturally have more appeal to me than others. This one has some professional merits and is also amusing because of my own interest in photography. You count yourself as pretty skilled with women but it strikes me that you are awfully naive about them at the same time. The women you have been going out with are sufficiently circumspect to not want to become part of a collection you are intent on acquiring. It is one thing to model, for which one receives a fee and which is considered a professional activity, and another thing to record for posterity one's sexual involvements. For many people sexual involvements are considered highly private matters and this seems to be the case for women more than men, or at least for more women than it is for you. The hesitancy your friends are demonstrating is probably a reflection of their uncertainty about your motives, which may be good judgment.

From a technical point of view, photographing the human figure is not that simple. While potentially graceful and pleasing to the eye, the human figure can also appear awkward and unappealing, making you wish you had stuck to your fantasies.

Question: I'm a 19 year old man. I have no problem with an erection, my penis is 5 1/2 inches in length, which is just fine with me. However, when my penis hangs limp it can vary from one inch to four inches in length. Is this normal, or would you advise seeing a doctor? I purposely stay out of any situation which might involve a shower with other men because I am embarrassed.

Answer: No.
Question: When I obtain an erection, my penis is 5 1/2 inches in length, which is just fine with me. However, when my penis hangs limp it can vary from one inch to four inches in length. Is this normal, or would you advise seeing a doctor? I purposely stay out of any situation which might involve a shower with other men because I am embarrassed.

Answer: You describe a perfectly normal situation. The size of the unerect penis is not very related to the size of the erect penis. The small ones get much bigger while the big ones increase only slightly. Any man who has been watching his penis will observe that it can vary tremendously in size depending upon body temperature and degree of activity, among other things. Throw away your tape measure and live a little.

Question: I know that electrolysis is the best way to remove unwanted hair from a woman's upper lip. A few girls I have talked to feel that shaving off such hair will cause it to grow back darker, coarser, and thicker. I find it very hard to think that shaving will cause more hairs to grow out of one's face, i.e. new ones in addition to those cut off before.

Answer: Shaving does not change the quantity of hair. However, the blunt ends that result give a false appearance of thickness and they do feel bristly. Small amounts of hair on the upper lip can be managed by shaving, cutting closely or by using a bleaching cream to lighten them and make them less conspicuous. Such a cream can be made of 6% hydrogen peroxide and soap flakes or a solution of 1 oz. of peroxide and 20 drops of ammonia.

gives it enough attention to boost the grade up to whatever level with which he feels comfortable.

In terms of grades, that may be okay. But it isn't learning. "Seven-Seven-Three" simply takes the same number of class hours of a traditional semester and punches them into smaller segments so that the student takes two courses at a time, and pours all of his attention into in-depth study. The old semester is gone.

"Seven-Seven-Three" simplifies, reduces course proliferation and concentrates energy. Students take two courses during "Seven," one course during "Three."

The new calendar, too, according to the editors, forces a "re-think" on all courses, Professors will change method and content so that formal coursework becomes a building block toward field experience.

FILM NOTES

are Patricia Neal, Billy Gray, and Sam Jaffe.

THE DAY THE EARTH STOOD STILL, long considered one of the best science fiction films, and THE DAMNED, a recent study of Nazi Germany, will be presented on Saturday, April 7 and Tuesday, April 10, respectively. Both films will begin at 8 p.m. in Dana Auditorium. Guilford students will be admitted free with I.D.

THE DAY THE EARTH STOOD STILL is the story of Klaatu (Michael Rennie) who comes from a planet 250 million miles away and lands his spaceship in Washington, D.C. Representing a far more advanced civilization, he comes to earth in peace, but is welcomed by hostile troops and a gittery G.I.'s bullet. Therein begins the intriguing story of his escape and recovery in a Washington boarding house.

TIME said: "By far the best of Hollywood's recent flights into science-fiction, combines a glimpse into the futuristic marvels of outer space with a thoughtful look at the seedy old earth of 1951. Like THE THING, it is the story of a visitor from another planet. But Klaatu is no villainous monster; he is an ultra-civilized human being who makes the earthmen, by contrast, look like a monstrous race of Yahoos.

"Klaatu's escape touches off a vast monster-hunt, demonstrating the earthling's frightening capacity for panic, ignorance, unreasoning hostility and pygmy-minded self-seeking."

The film is directed by Robert Wise, who directed THE ANDROMEDA STRAIN and THE HAUNTING, shown earlier this year. Although the film was made in 1951, the message remains pertinent to today's society. Also starring Tickle.

Voluntary Action
Washington, D.C. 20013

are Patricia Neal, Billy Gray, and Sam Jaffe.

THE DAMNED represents the interest in the value of protest on the part of Luchino Visconti, acclaimed as one of the leading film directors of our time. The film, which probes the soul of Germany on the eve of Nazi power, has been described by Judith Crist as "A shattering experience in the watching and unforgettable detailing of damnation in the recall! Such is the power of Visconti's visuals that the eye strays not for a moment."

In 1968, when Luchino Visconti was in New York to direct "The Marriage of Figaro" at the Metropolitan Opera House, he observed, "I have the impression that the ferment among young people in the United States is more sincere than perhaps it is elsewhere. Here the concrete protest can be both beneficial and necessary under certain conditions."

Since that time, Visconti has written and directed "The Damned," which states unequivocally Visconti's views on the value of protest.

"I am making "The Damned" for the generations who do not know what Nazism was like," the director said. In pointing the finger of responsibility at German industrialists who helped create the madness of the Second World War by backing Hitler with vital arms, Visconti points out, "The young people must understand that it is the absence of protest that constitutes the blackest evil in my drama. In this film, the leaders of a vital steel empire choose profits and personal power rather than obstruct 'that gentleman from Berlin'."

Revolutionary 7-7-3 Program Introduced

Forest Grove, Ore. (I.P.) - In a two-year study leading up to recent reforms, the Committee on Long-Range Goals said if Pacific University is to attain a distinctiveness to make it visible, if Pacific is to become more viable against growing competition, the curriculum changes would have to be truly substantive.

The devices by which these sweeping changes will be ushered in? Deceptively modest-sounding ones, really. They're called the "Three-One" and "Seven-Seven-Three" programs.

"Three-One" refers to the four years a student spends at college. Formal academic work will be condensed into the first three years. The fourth year, with the possible exception of the final weeks, will be spent in the field - perhaps abroad, or in other parts of the country - where the student will receive supervised, practical experience in a field he hopes to pursue.

Under "Seven-Seven-Three", the annual academic calendar is divided into six periods of time -- two terms of seven weeks each; a three-week term; two more seven-week terms; and a final term of three weeks. During the seven-week sessions, a student may enroll for two academic courses and for only one during the three-week term.

And therein lies the beauty, according to the editors of Pacific Today. Their recent "A Time For Change" issue points out that "Seven-Seven-Three" is designed to avoid diluting the student's attention. One of the things wrong with higher education is that when a student carries as many as five or six courses over a 14-week semester, a couple of two-hour courses usually get only "back-burner" attention, at best.

The student might juggle his major courses until his standing in the two-hour course seems in peril. Then he

Bike Broken?
See Doug or Alex
every Wednesday morning
8-12
Hobbs Porch
Little or no Charge