What's a Jud Board?

By Susan Ide

In the wake of recent Judicial Board hearings, the campus is astir with students voicing concern about the fairness of such procedures as well as expressing interest in how the Judicial Board actually works

Present at each hearing is a group of five students and three faculty members. These mem-bers of the Judicial Board are the ''core'' group. There are the "core" group. There are five student alternates who sit in when one of the "core"

The meetings are always held on Sunday, unless there are special reasons for not doing so. They are held in Founders, in any room that happens to be free. Meetings begin by a statement of the infraction that has allegedly been committed.

Following this there is a period in which the crime is discussed, each side having a chance to give their version of the story. Both sides are allowed to have witnesses and character references.

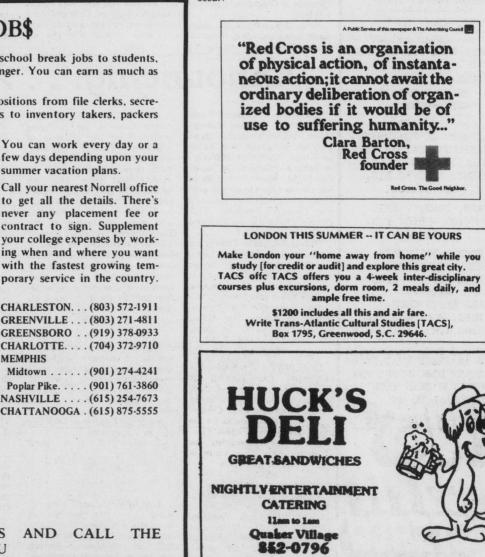

After hearing this, the Judicial Board excuses everyone and decides on guilt or innocence, through Quaker consensus. Therefore it must be a unanimous decision.

The punishments of convicted students are listed in the back of the student handbook. They range from a warning to suspension to from school.

Some minor crimes are settled "out of court". Often in minor honor code violations the teacher, the accused, and Bob White get together and decide when to do. It is these kinds of cases that end in the student being made to write letters to the Editor in the Guilfordian

Students applying to be on the Judicial Board are chosen by a committee with Ken Schwab and Bob White. They were unavailable for further information to be gathered on this issue.

According to Lynn Bryant, a Judicial Board member, the Judicial Board hears about one or two cases a month. "Most of the cases we hear are honor code violations," and housing violations" Lynn commented. The cases are generally heard the Sunday after they occur
