Recycling: students want results now

Melissa Hoopes

I remember Guilford College's fight to protect its historic woods from the threatening Painter Boulevard a few years ago. Because of the administration's efforts, I believed that Guilford College had an honest commitment to preserving the natural environment.

Since that time I have become disheartened by the lack of response to the numerous requests for a recycling system for our campus. It is difficult for many members of the student body to believe that it has taken so long for the administration to act. It seems that although students have worked hard to convince the Guilford College community that they believe that recycling is necessary, all of their efforts have been in vain.

In the Spring of 1993, members of Forevergreen, Guilford's environmental organization, spent every Sunday afternoon sorting the glass, aluminum, plastics and newspapers dropped off by other students. Months passed and although we were pleased that more people were recycling, we soon realized that we could not promote additional recycling because it was beyond our capacity.

Furthermore, we were concerned that the student body was growing dependent on Forevergreen's services. We decided that we needed to spend more time educating the students, staff and administration about the importance of recycling. We believed that the grass roots education and encouragement would be the only way to ensure that recycling would continue here in the future.

When we approached the members of the administration, we were told that it was preferred that Forevergreen stop recycling for the rest of the campus. The administration was concerned that one of us might get hurt and the college would be liable. Furthermore, we were told that Bill Scott, Head of Grounds and Maintenance, was heavily involved in recycling ef-orts on North Carolina and that he was working on establishing a system at Guilford.

Independently, Forevergreen began researching different recycling possibilities and presented them to Bill Scott and other administrators. When we told Gary Kenton, a well-known environmentalist in the Greensboro area, about our difficulties, he wrote a letter to President Bill Rogers asking him to support our efforts. Since that time, we have continued on our crusade. We have continued educating and encouraging the student body to recycle on their own until we get our own system. We also have organized Sunday afternoon carpooling for students wanting to take their recyclable to local centers.

Although last year there was an attempt by the administration to have aluminum recycling for the campus, it was a failed effort, because the administration placed the responsibility of removing the cans on the shoulders of a student
