WATER PROBLEMS IN BINFORD

On August 29th, students in Binford Hall had no water, and reported difficulties in flushing the toilet and taking showers.

According to Suzanne Williams in building maintenance, the Binford resident advisor's bathtub faucet would not shut off. Building maintenance at first thought that repairs would take about thirty minutes, but they soon found out that it was a more serious problem. In order to fix the leak, they were forced to turn off water throughout Binford Hall for six hours.

TELECOMMUNICATION INNOVATIONS

This year students can access their Personal Security Codes or PSC codes without the pound button. Students now have the choice of dialing either pound-2 or, now, 8-9.

According to Director of Telecommunications Jim Luke, several students were unable to use their PSC code last year because they could not dial the pound(#)-2 combination required to access it. He said that this is because many phones have a redial button in the place of where the pound button normally is located.

CONSTRUCTION ON CAMPUS

Wonder what exactly all those bulldozers on campus are doing?

According to building maintenance, the construction project is putting in a water line that will increase water pressure to several buildings that have pressure problems.

Low pressure causes problems with flushing several toilets at one time, and also taking showers at the same time. Increasing the water pressure makes it easier and more efficient to use the rest room.

The water line will expand the length of campus, from the apartments all the way past New Garden Hall and Dana Auditorium to Friendly Avenue.

The water line will take approximately two to three more weeks to complete.

VOICE MAIL

STILL AVAILABLE

According to Jim Luke, director of telecommunications, a few voice mail accounts are still available.

This year, voice mail has double the storage space it had last year. According to Luke, the service has become very popular, as telecommunications has already sold about three times as much voice mail as last year.

Telecommunications has sold approximately one hundred accounts to date, and can still sell an indefinite number. There is no "number" limit, only a limit of hard-drive space. Luke will determine when the hard-drive is full, and then will stop selling the accounts.

and integrity, and the students seem really genuine," she said. Wanting to teach at a small, liberal arts school, Catherine finds Guilford to possess strong academic rigor in addition to the strong emphasis placed on actual teaching.

"One of the things I like about Guilford is the importance they place on teaching; whereas, at a larger school, professors would be more concerned about research work," she said.

Catherine integrates her faith in teaching in her General Psychology and Introduction to Clinical Psychology classes. Here she develops her personal teaching style. "In all my classes, whether they are lecture or seminar-style classes, I try to get as much active participation as possible. I find my students to be more highly motivated than average," she said.

Completing her undergraduate work at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, Catherine's career plans did not always include teaching psychology.

"I always knew I wanted to be a psychologist but I didn't have any specific career goals in that field. The teaching came as a surprise. I'm a shy person, but I discovered I loved teaching and learned to overcome the stage fright because I really liked what I was talking about," she said. Before Catherine made this discovery, however, she worked for two years doing highway safety research work.

"After graduation, I worked at the University of North Carolina researching drinking and driving and its effects. The University's research went to help North Carolina's state agencies and other state agencies as well," she said.

Venturing overseas, Catherine next took a teaching position with University of Maryland's United States military program. In places like Germany, Italy, and Asia, she taught psychology to men and women in the military who were interested in furthering their education while overseas on duty.

After three years of teaching with that program, she became the program's regional director, but after three years, she came back to the United States.

Last year Catherine divided her time teaching classes at North Carolina Central, Elon College, and UNC-Chapel Hill, where she also received her Ph.D. in experimental psychology with a clinical minor. Although her job at Guilford is designed as a one-year position, Catherine says she would like to stay longer.

"I'm hoping the position will develop into something more permanent. I would like to develop more courses in the future, in addition to possibly getting involved with the study abroad programs. I am also interested in participating in some of the campus activities," she said. Living on the Guilford campus by the lake, Catherine describes herself as an athlete, as her main interests include running, cycling, playing tennis and volleyball. She also enjoys cooking and playing with her new dog.
