Education honors all cultures

Nov. 12 - 16 was International Education Week. The week was not only observed within the United States, but in U.S. embassies around the world as well. This was a wonderful opportunity to look around and learn about other cultures.

Guilford participated in the observance with its own list of activities, including international films, international entrees, a presentation entitled "Operation Desert Storm: A Soldier's Perspective," and a session about feng shui. It is not surprising that Guilford would plan a full week of activities since it continually strives to promote awareness of other cultures both inside and outside of the curriculum.

John Teague, a Guilford history major and former para-rescue jumper during Desert Storm, spoke about the training he had to go through and some of his experiences. The para-rescue unit of the Special Forces follows the motto, "that others may live." They certainly seem to live up to that oath. All of the operations they perform are covert and they do not need any defense because no one knows what they are doing.

At the end, Teague said that the war "taught [him] a great deal about human nature and how to work with diverse groups of people." I think that is great to hear that a soldier was

Lilly Endowment awards Guilford $2 million

James Hart

The Lilly Endowment, of Indianapolis, Indiana, awarded Guilford College a grant of $2 million on Nov. 20. The award is the largest single foundational grant in the college's history.

The grant was given as part of the endowment's second round of its "Programs for Theological Exploration of Vocation" initiative, through which it has also given grants to Duke and Wake Forest Universities.

The grant will go towards

Guilford's new "Initiative on Faith and Practice." The Initiative will draw on the college's Quaker heritage in order to find ways to create future leaders who "[live] in the intersection of faith and practice," as President Don McNemar put it in last Tuesday's press release.

The Initiative on Faith and Practice is a program with the following stated objectives:

* It will strengthen the Quaker Leadership Scholars Program and the Interdisciplinary Leadership for Social Change Program.

* It will provide resources for faculty to create components on faith and vocation in their courses.

* It will provide advising and support for students with an
