

Athletes respond to Bryan incident

Referring to the rumors, Bante said, "This is a time where more people notice the divide, but it is a great opportunity to do something about it."

An idea suggested by senior Billie Pellerito was to implement a "do-what-you-don't-week," a week where all Guilford students can try activities they normally would not have time for. During such a week, a Guilford basketball player could try painting or sculpting, and a theatre studies major could play catch with a football.

Other members of the community, including Head Football Coach Kevin Kiesel and Bante, feel the gap is artificial. "Athletes look like everyone else," Bante said.

Kiesel trusts activities like the closed forum and the Guilford judicial system to help the healing process.

Prior to the forum, Kiesel and his players remained silent whenever the Bryan incident was mentioned.

Kiesel mentioned two reasons for the lack of comments on the incident: he wanted to protect the judicial system of the college, and he felt no need to grab the media's attention.

"People today are very intelligent; they understand our news today," Kiesel said. "President Kent Chabotar did a great job saying we will go through the process methodically."

The forums, Kiesel said, show that all students care and that the school is very important to the entire student body - art major, business major, soccer player, or football player. Also according to Kiesel, it is important for the community as a whole to work for the healing process.

"Once we step back and let the community work," Kiesel said, "this will all get back to normal."

North Carolina Student Summit for HIV/AIDS Awareness and Activism

Saturday, February 17

HIV infects 42 million people worldwide, and affects millions more. On Saturday, February 17th, learn how you can stop this pandemic. Join students from around the North Carolina to explore the local, national and global impact of HIV/AIDS at the Summit for AIDS Awareness and Activism—right here at Guilford.

Thelma Wright, the founder of the North Carolina Harm Reduction Coalition, will be the keynote speaker. The Summit will include sessions on lobbying, community service, AIDS and the faith community, a Queer Response to AIDS, and AIDS in the African-American Community.

The cost is free, but a suggested donation of $3 will benefit the Triad Health Project, a local AIDS Service Organization.

Registration is in Founders Hall from 9:30-10:30 am.

To register, or ask questions, email cap@guilford.edu
