What First

The twins have one love—traveling, especially with their father on business trips. His job takes him to the coal and gold mines all over South America. They will remain at Salem "until daddy gets ready to move again".

This is their first time away from all of the family. "A movie, a hamburger and bowling kept us from being homesick the first day, and since that first day we haven't remembered to get homesick. All this visiting keeps us busy." They also like the idea of having a 'big sister' "if only she'll do our homework and washing."

A southern accent is one trait they don't want to pick up. Ingrid vows that she talked continuously the first day without having one idea of what people were saying to her.

Neither has made any future plans, but it is sure that whatever they may be they'll include traveling, good times and maybe an "older man".

The contest was an effort on the part of the Salemite to foster an interest in writing and to ascertain which members of the freshman class were interested in and suited for membership on the staffs of the two campus publications.

a tooth-less, dandruff-spattered comb through her filthy, grease-burdened hair, her young friends once again entered the chamber.

"C'mon Hermie, we're goin'!" snorted Daphne O'Shay, (a graceful, nymph-like child, with the natural beauty of a wild Irish rose.)

"We're off!" they shouted, cascading down the corridor, phlanx style, arms entwined about each other's waists, and singing in clear, youthful, intrepid tones:

"A keg o' beer

A parked car

And thou—wow!"

Four hours later Hermione and her comrades stumbled up the staircase of their modern, fireproof dormitory.

"What a night!" croaked Daphne O'Shay.

"What a night!" agreed Lorna Doone.

"What a night!" added Flossie Bobsey.

"What a night!" offered Nancy Drew.

"What a night!" countered Sister Carrie.

"Ho hum," suggested Hermione, "Guess I'll get back to my washing."
