

Bill Expresses Individuality

By Diane Knott

Bill, called "Sir William" by the family, inherited his silky blond hair from his mother, his blue eyes from his father, his small bone structure from his paternal grandfather and the habit of stamping his foot from me. The family has unanimously agreed, however, that what is behind his eyes and within his small skull was not inherited from anyone.

His peculiar eating habits have never been a characteristic of our family. Thus meat, potatoes, bread, peas and anything else he will allow to be poked into his mouth do not follow the normal pattern of digestion. Instead, they are permanently stored in his left jaw. Even the most gruesome stories of Martin, the little boy who kept food in his jaw so long that it began to drag him around, fail to make the slightest impression on "Sir William."

When he is punished, Bill's yelps fill the neighborhood. They are not sounds of repentance or sorrow, but siren-like protests against authority and the belittlement of his four year old dignity. His refusal to exhale causes his complexion to turn deep purple and rage causes his face to become a wrinkled mass of fury.

If Bill is ignored by anyone, he sulks and pouts. He bangs toys around until the entire house seems to vibrate. After he realizes this method is ineffective (if anyone's ears can stand it that long), he reverses his tactics. Inch by inch he will advance toward his victim. Looking up with an angelic expression on his face, he will say "I like you." If he received any response he will run quickly away chuckling to himself in a manner that says "I knew you would think I'm cute!"
