

Around . . .

There wasn't a large crowd in the church, but those who had come were so enthusiastic and appreciative it didn't matter. Then came the crisis. Midway in the program, a tall, lanky boy got up to announce the offering. The girls flaked! Nobody had even vaguely suspected such a thing. They hung their heads and tried to melt into their seats. Then the little boy who was to pray the offertory prayer stepped forward. "Dear God," he said, "please bless those who gave . . . and those who didn't."

This pint-size diplomat made us feel more comfortable, to say the least. The rest of the service went according to schedule, and all agreed that the trip to "Russell's Church" had been wonderful.

Even those juniors doing last minute cramming for Dr. Africa's history test put down their books and went to see the steady stream of water that suddenly began pouring from South's living room ceiling Tuesday night. The innocent looking cracks in the ceiling mysteriously became the main drains for the upstairs bathtubs. When the neon light fixture began to emit its store of H2O the dorm decided to make a little extra money by charging people to see the only, man-made, neon waterfall in the world. However, a little sober advice from the plumbers has everything under control. Now we all are going on the old-fashion bath routine of one a week, since it's only safe to use the three, downstairs tubs. It was great fun though and it will probably be source for further entertainment as the little pieces of plaster occasionally drop from the ceiling.
