

Soviet Policy Forum Will Be At W.C.U.N.C.

Opportunities for students of international relations to get first-hand accounts of the trend of Russian and United States policies from experts with widely divergent opinions will be offered next month at Woman's College.

Vera Micheles Dean, Russian-born author, lecturer and expert on international affairs; Bertram D. Wolfe, free-lance writer on history and political science and personal acquaintance of such Soviet leaders as Stalin, Molotov, Bukharin and Trotsky; and Frederick L. Schuman, who remains peerless as a political historian and chronicler of international diplomacy, will be on the college campus Nov. 14-15 as principal speakers at the 11th annual Harriet Elliott Social Science Forum.

Presentations by the well-known historians, audience participation in question sessions, informal round-table discussions and panel debates will feature the two-day conference on "Russia and the United States: Powers In Profile."

Information and reservations may be obtained by writing to Miss Ione Grogan, Woman's College, Greensboro.

Dr. Dean, who came to the United States in 1919, has been research director of the Foreign Policy Assn. since 1938. Among her publications are "The United States and Russia," published in 1950, and "Foreign Policy Without Fear." She not only edits the FPA Bulletin and Headline Series, but regularly contributes articles to them and to other publications.

Bertram D. Wolfe, since 1934 a writer on history and political science, has made three trips to Russia. During the Korean War he set for the U. S. State Department an Ideological Advisory Staff, serving as its chief for three years.

Schuman, the third forum speaker, disagrees sharply with Wolfe on the future for Russia, but concedes that his analyses are "astute" and his defense of his point of view "masterly."

Home Economics Majors Have New Opportunities In A Variety Of Fields

In the past, the general opinion was that a home economics major was preparing to be a future homemaker or a teacher of high school girls, and this was all her education would enable her to do. However, as manufacturers and merchants began to take notice of the fact that women were the greatest buying force in our country, the girl with a major in home economics was in great demand in places other than the classroom, and numerous fields of study were opened to her.

These available fields include publishing, advertising, television, radio and research as well as government, welfare and institutional management.

In order to prepare a girl for these various opportunities, Salem College has provided for her a department in home economics located on the third floor of the science building. Acting as head of this department is Mrs. Snow who graduated from Woman's College in 1952 and received her master of education in home economics in 1955. Mrs. Stewart who serves as teacher of clothing and textiles is the other member of the home economics staff.

As in all other courses of study, teachers serve as guides and cannot learn subject matter for the individual. Therefore, a major in home economics is given the choice of taking her freshman course in the principles of food preparation and selection with an introduction to the study of nutrition and to the planning and serving of meals, or a course studying the principles of selection and construction as applied to garments using cotton, linen, and synthetic fabrics. Depending on which course is taken first, a home economics major's course of study revolving around these subjects is then planned for the next three years. For example in the fields of foods and nutrition a student advances from the fundamental skills to more advanced studies including experimental cookery, institutional marketing and management, quantity cookery as well as studies of nutrition under various social and economic conditions and diet therapy. Likewise, in the field of clothing and textiles a student proceeds from the fundamental skill of sewing to the study of tailoring and clothing construction, selection of textile fabrics and eventually to the designing of her own garment.

However, home economics is not limited to these two fields of study, but includes many varied courses which deal with all aspects of home life. For example, the study on the growth and development of the child from infancy through pre-school period including a brief study of the principles of nursing as applied to the home is offered and taken by home economic majors. Courses studying the planning and furnishing of a home as well as a study of furniture, fabrics, and appliances enables a home economics major to participate in the field of interior decorating. Home economics majors also study ways to select china, crystal, silver, and linens and ways to combine these into attractive table appointments. Included in the study of table appointments are ways of arranging flowers and using candles to provide a pleasing appearance.

The home economics department then is concerned with all phases of activity which are applicable to the science and art of homemaking—a practical and scientific education which can be used in homes, businesses, and industries.
