Who's Who Marches On!

Once again, Salem has an impressive list of outstanding seniors who have achieved recognition for their college work by being placed upon the American Colleges and Universities' list of Who's Who. To be nominated for such an honor the girl must have a good academic average and have been elected to responsible positions in extracurricular organizations. To discover who's who and who's what among American college students, the following is a brief description of Salem's representatives.

Senior class president Lisa Herron is one of the eleven excited nominees. She styles herself as a "damn Yankee" from Buffalo, New York, who has enjoyed her four years at Salem more than she could ever express. Many Salemites will remember her best dressed in ski pants and ski jacket ready to hit the slopes. Lisa has also been an active member of SSC - running those lights and controlling the sound for assemblies. She is sorry to see the 4 years pass and finds it difficult to believe that it's almost time to get out into the "hard cruel world."

Sharing Lisa's dismay at the fact that she too will be leaving Salem in only seven short months is classmate Jeannie Dorsey. Jeannie promises regardless of where she ends up, even if it is in the back woods of Canada, that she will publicize Salem C. loudly. Jeannie feels very lucky to have been elected to all the positions she has held in the past three years and believes "getting involved" is the key to a successful college career. She calls herself the "stunned" president of her sophomore class and commented that was the only year the class actually made money on buying their rings. Then, as a junior, the "grand" marshal followed Mr. Pete's footsteps all year long. And now, her senior year is marked by I.R.S. calling for "intervisitation," "better food - forget the raisins!" and another "John Denver" concert. In attempting to decide what a person should do, Jeannie professes a modified epicurean philosophy - sit back and enjoy! She strongly feels that happiness at Salem comes from an inner gladness.

Cathy Gazes agrees with Jeannie's emphasis upon involvement. She feels involvement in both the academic and extracurricular fields was a learning experience which broadened her understanding not only of herself but of the community in which she lived. Cathy stated the "names" of the various offices she has held have no real significant value nor do the "names" of the clubs in which she participated. What is of value to Cathy is the kind of person she found herself becoming because of the working part she held in Salem's community. Cathy hopes Salemites will reach out and take from Salem all she has to offer, in order to establish a strong foundation for the future.

Sarah Dorrier, a senior from Winnsboro, South Carolina, confesses that she has done a little bit of everything here at Salem - from sitting in a pot for Pierettes to mopping up the bathroom floor as house president of Babcock. She has participated in student government from almost every angle - committees, inter-dorm council, and leg board. She's still writing for the Salemite, and even studying a little bit! One of her more exciting escapades was the summer she spent in Oslo, Norway on the Hattie Strong Scholarship. She has a passion for history and English, and is also beginning to be paranoid about graduation. For Sarah, Salem is many things, but mostly it's people.

Sarah's roommate, Catherine Cooper, states that her general attitude while at Salem has been never to miss anything. Her record of participation confirms this personal attitude. Catherine became active her freshman year as co-chairman of Founder's Day and hasn't quit since, presently being the chairman of Honor Council. In between official meetings and trying to keep up with studies, she stuck her nose into just about everything and wouldn't take anything for the experiences that came her way as a result. She's had an inside view of the "infamous" Piedmont Lecture Series, the Easter sunrise service, the Winston-Salem Symphony, Wake Forest classes, most of the antiwar demonstrations on campus and in Winston, and has probably been in 95% of the movies and restaurants in town. It's hard for her to pinpoint what she enjoyed the most other than the quiet, free atmosphere of Salem that made it possible for her to try her wings in a number of ways.

Scottie Newell comments that as long as she has been at Salem she feels she has been a secretary - referring of course to the positions held in her sophomore class and later in Student Government. Her only attempt at being a treasurer came her freshman year, but that she states was before anyone knew she hated math. During those days of keeping the "minutes" Scottie changed her major three times from French to Sociology to Art; however, now she concedes she is happy! This year, Scottie works at the Alumnae office, studies and attends classes, eats ice cream, and occasionally finds time to complete a quilt she began last January. As far as being on Who's Who, Scottie expresses much surprise and feels highly honored.

Allison Towne is a history major from Lakeland, Florida. While at Salem, she has been actively involved with important student-faculty committees - attempting to get better assembly speakers as well as more entertaining facilities for the student center. Like Sarah, Allison counts her experiences in Oslo, Norway as one of the most exciting events related to Salem. Besides an enthusiasm for history, Allison is a big sports fan and sports participator. She has served on WRA and is known among tennis players on campus to be a strong, fast-playing opponent. She is also the columnist who keeps us up on the ACC through her weekly articles in the Salemite. Allison shares the excitement of the other girls in her selection for Who's Who.

Jennie Snead hails from Culpeper, Virginia and possesses the remarkable record of being Clewell dorm president for two consecutive years. Besides serving on Interdorm Council in her capacity as dorm chief, Jennie also served on the Academic and Honor Councils. Between study time and attending the meetings of the councils, Jennie enjoys a good hand of bridge. She feels honored to have been chosen to represent Salem among other colleges and universities throughout America.

Christina Spence describes herself as a Charlotte girl who has made it through three years at Salem C. and is determinedly attacking the fourth. She states that her three years here have been full of surprises - one of which is having been selected for Who's Who. Surprises before this one, she commented, came with elections - first becoming Interdorm Council Chairman her junior year and then being elected Student Government President. Christina feels she has had too many good surprises, but admits she would not trade them for anything. Her future plans are very sketchy; however, she hopes to do graduate work in art history, her major at Salem.

Anna Moore Butzner is a talkative history major who is currently serving as president of the recently renamed Salem Forum. Anna Moore has always been involved with history in one way or another having been a delegate to the Model U.N. and a "behind-the-scenes" planner for the mini-symposium "Women in Politics." But, Anna Moore will probably be best remembered for her fine job as co-chairman of the Help fund her sophomore year. Of all her experiences, she found this job the most gratifying because its success reflected the generosity of Salem's students and faculty. For Anna Moore it is the people at Salem who are the major source of her joyful four years. Anna Moore sums up her feelings towards Salem in commenting - "Gee I'm glad I chose Salem." She probably speaks for all the seniors in that one simply expressed statement.

Petite Jan Shivel hails from Williamsburg, Virginia. Editor of "Incunabula", Jan was last year's April Arts president, and former Chairwoman of the sophomore Christmas banquet. English, art, and Davidson occupy most of her time these days.
