

JOKES

"Miss Hoagland, how in the world can any one inherit chewing, chewing gum?" Asked Margaret Craig.

Hero Stone: "How you gonna study when your lights go out?"

Dr. Caviness (passing a group of girls on front steps, the night of the banquet) "I don't believe we all were treated fair, I wonder if we had dinner."

Ava Woody: "More than usual."

A REAL GHOST

ing late one night, the ghost entered at her door, stood there before her, clad in a long full-skirted brown dress, a brown cloak over her shoulders, and a little brown hood on her head. She looked at the teacher for just a moment—then vanished quickly into mere nothingness!

Very early one morning, as one of the students was returning to her own room from another dormitory where she had spent the night, she saw the little brown lady stooping over one of the rose bushes, smelling the roses, and touching them all very tenderly. But even as the student watched the lady, the apparition vanished into the misty vagueness of the early dawn.

The ghost was seen several other times too, but always either when twilight was deepening, when the darkness was spread over the land, or when the dawn was still dim, grey, and misty—it never appeared in the light of day. It seems that the brightness of day would have been too much for the frail and ethereal little body to withstand.

It has been thought, though we can never know, that the ghost-lady was the spirit of the mother of the old woman who was so reluctant in giving up the brick house to strangers who might perhaps frighten or disturb the gentle spirit.

Now there is only pile of brick where the little house stood, and the ghost-lady is seen no more. But perhaps she does still walk, and perhaps it is only because we have become too "grown-up" or too sceptical, that we no longer see the ghost. Perhaps, since this is Meredith's own ghost, we can make ourselves believe in it just once more, and invoke the little brown ghost to return to us on Hallowe'en night of this year!
