Sophomores Become "Ladies for a Day" on March 3 in Observance of the Traditional "Soph Day Off"

The sophomores were "Ladies for a Day" on the Meredith campus March third, when they observed the traditional Soph Day Off. According to custom green stockings were very much in evidence when every sophomore appeared Saturday morning in a white dress and green stockings. Activities for the day began before the rising bell when the sophomores bombarded the freshman dormitory in a successful attempt to rout their charges from bed. Through various means the freshmen were given to understand what things were expected from them during the day and one of the first requirements was that they were to bow at the sight of green stockings. Also, they were not to appear on the campus during the morning without a hat, they were to carry their books to class in a pillow case, and were to carry books for sophomores whenever so requested.

A visitor on the campus would have probably stood still and wondered had she witnessed a group of fifteen or twenty freshmen strolling across the court toward the class buildings, wearing hats, and carrying their books slung across their backs in pillow cases. Suddenly, a pair of green stockings appeared on the landscape and without hesitancy, the entire group dropped on their knees.

Perhaps amused would not exactly describe the feeling one would have experienced had she peeped in on a freshman class during the morning and seen the submissive maids seated on class, still wearing their hats and holding on their laps pillow cases of books.

The hats were not doffed even for meals and there was quite a bit of amusement in the dining hall when all the sophomores at one table rose from their places, walked the length of the hall, and calmly requested one of the freshmen to put on a hat that had been removed.

And then there is the story of the Sophomore who carried a dictionary and an out-of-date history book to class all day for the sole purpose of furnishing books for freshmen to carry.

The sophomores chose this day to sing for the first time their class song which was recently written by members of the class.

The crowning event of the activities was the Meredith-State-Wake Forest party in the evening, and the sophomores ended their day's program by serenading their class president about midnight Saturday night.
