Steven J. Austin

Dear Steven: My roommate has a parttime job at a restaurant that gets her home at 3 a.m. four days a week. As soon as she walks into our room she turns on the stereo and raids the frig. Between the music and the munching she's driving me crazy. We're only five months into a two-year lease. I don't know if I can make it. What's a poor girl to do?

— YAWNING

Dear Yawning: An early birthday present is in order. A set of headphones with a cord long enough to reach the refrigerator should get the message across. Pleasant dreams.

Dear Steven: I'm a member of a conservative campus group, and would like to suggest putting an end to the practice of playing loud music out of dorm room windows. To tell you the truth, it's not the decibels that bother me, it's the obnoxious, vulgar, heavy metal lyrics and sounds I can't stand. Maybe a law allowing only certain kinds of music would work. What do you think?

— EARPLUGS

Dear Earplugs: I think you're a jerk. That's not the way it works in this country.

Dear Steven: When I moved into town last March the first thing I did was transfer my personal checking account from my hometown bank. I had no complaints about the service I was getting until I received my first bank statement. It contained numerous charges for items the banker told me were free. It's six months later and I still can't get the mess straightened out. It's me and my hundred bucks against a big bank and a ton of red tape. Any suggestions?

— BANKING ON YOUR HELP

Dear Banking: Considering what's at stake, banks usually are very careful when handling new accounts. After all, they need your money to make money. Before blowing your stack, give the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation hotline a call. It's set up to offer advice to individuals having problems with banks. I've used their free service before and, believe me, they can help. Call them toll-free during regular business hours at 1-800-424-5488. I hope you get the answers you're looking for and, when you do, contact your banker again. Stay calm, but don't be afraid to speak up. Remember, it's your money. Good luck.

Send your problems, questions and comments to Steve the Bartender, care of The Twig.
