everything we knew." Cook supervised the actual making of the quilt.

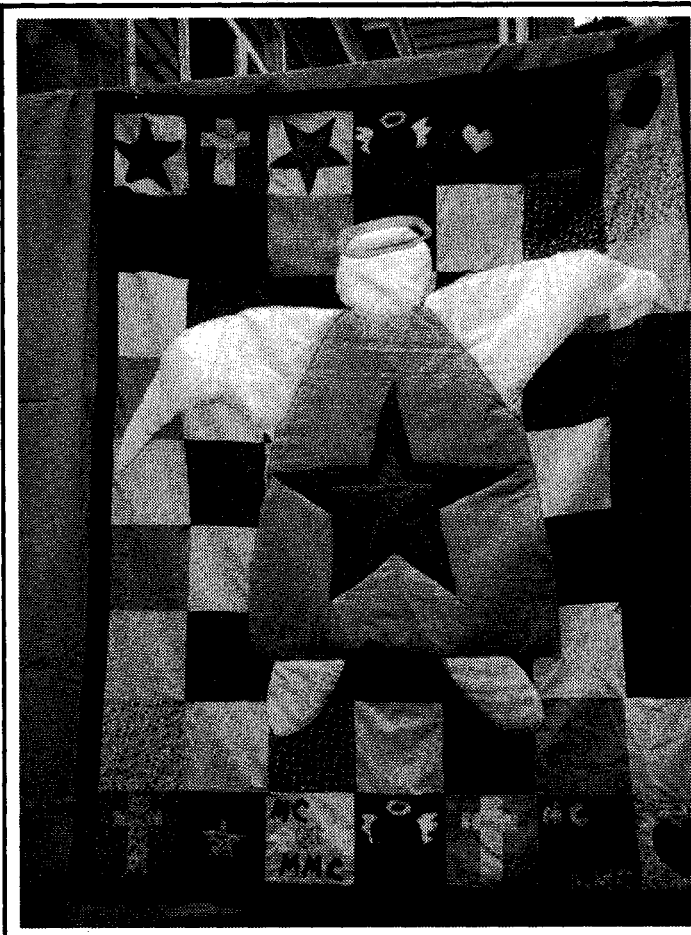

Becky Oatsvall in the Business department was one the faculty members that went to present the quilt.

"We were just the lucky ones who got to present it. There was a reception. It was a wonderful experience," recalls Oatsvall. "There was a bond there that surprised me at how the students from Meredith and there did together. The quilt is on display in their chapel."

According to Wray, the quilt was made to show Meredith's sister school that "we're just thinking of them." Revelle believes that the job was well worth it.

"It was really rewarding to see how our work paid off and how much they appreciated it," says Revelle.

The quilt that the students and faculty sewed displays a large angel.

Seniors prepare for 'real world'

JAMIE TUNNELL

May is quickly approaching and seniors are filling out applications for jobs, apartments and graduate schools. While trying to finish up their undergraduate degrees, they are bombarded with what to do next year and where to go.

LaShaun York, Career Peer Educator, is helping with a Senior Transition Seminar that will help balance all the issues that the "real world" will bring.

Career Peer Educators help market the Career Center's services and develop E-leads, an Internet job lead site, and some of the other programs that the Career Center offers.

Angie McNeill, assistant director for Employer Relations, says that the "importance is that seniors need to think about how life may be different after college and opportunities to hear from experts that can help with that transition."

Throughout the week of Feb. 18, workshops will be conducted as part of a Senior Transition Seminar.

On Monday, students can hear from human resource professionals who will discuss budgeting the new paycheck and becoming familiar with what companies will offer in terms of benefits. Tuesday will students can attend a business etiquette dinner that will familiarize students with general dining rules that will help make an impression on employers. On Wednesday night, a panel of Meredith alumnae will discuss what to expect after leaving Meredith College. The seminar series concludes on Thursday with real estate professionals who will help students with apartment searches and tell prospective renters what to ask when looking for apartments.

Regan Brown, a senior, said she is "not prepared for the moving out and having money for rent and bills and food."

It is a big change from dorm life and dining halls.

Other seniors are excited about what is ahead but are sad to leave behind the dorm life and traditional Meredith life.

"I am anticipating the change," said senior Wendy Sims.

"With part-time work and full load of school, I'm looking forward to a lighter load".

The seminar series can help apprehensive seniors as they being focus on their futures.

Students who are interested in attending the seminars can pick up information in the Career Center.

The sign-up for the business etiquette dinner is $10 and is limited to 15 students, so sign-up early.

Seniors will receive information in the mail about the rest of the workshops.

Call for papers for Artemisia Symposium

MELYSSA ALLEN

"Artemisia: Heroic Women from Antiquity into Modern Oblivion," an Undergraduate symposium is taking place April 12, 2002 at Meredith College in Raleigh, NC with a keynote address by Mary D. Garrard.

This symposium will emphasize women who have and continue to challenge the traditional passive role assigned to them. Are the issues for strong women of antiquity and the early modern period the same as for strong women of the 21st century?

We invite proposals from all disciplines that explore the ways that women have challenged traditional notions of female attributes and roles. Although this symposium culminates a number of events devoted to Artemisia Gentileschi, we hope that students will submit a wide variety of proposals ranging across all disciplines, from traditional academic papers to studio art works, to dance or musical compositions.

In addition to the April 12 symposium, we plan to host an online student's work.

Deadline: One-page proposal due February 1, 2002.
