"Found In Wrong Places"
It's A Bumper Crop
For Snake Farmer

More calls than usual on snakes have been received at the Agricultural Extension Office this summer. This could be due to the cold wet weather this past spring, slowing down the normal dispersal of snakes from winter locations. They have been found in the wrong place according to most homeowners that find one in their backyard or house.

The best advice for homeowners regarding snakes is to remove likely habitats, and close all entrances to homes such as the holes around utility connections. Learning to identify snakes, particularly distinguishing between poisonous and non-poisonous species will be helpful. Identification of poisonous snakes is not very difficult and many people may be surprised to learn there are more non-poisonous than poisonous ones.

All of our dangerous snakes belong to two groups, pit-vipers and coral snakes. The pit-vipers include rattlesnakes and moccasins. The moccasins includes the copperhead and cottonmouth. All of them have vertical pupils in their eyes resembling cat eyes. They have a deep pit on each side of the head between eye and nostril. The pits are large enough to be seen from a safe distance.

None of our harmless snake have pits. Only one of our dangerous snakes, the coral snake, has round pupils. The coral snake reaches its northern most range in North Carolina in the lower coastal plain and sandhills.

Control of snakes fall into three categories-environmental, snake proofing, and fencing. Debris, trash, and thick vegetation harbor snakes. Snakes enter houses through small openings such as around door seals and where pipes or other utility hardware enters. Snake fencing can be used for small areas such as play areas. It may not be practical to use for large areas. Special fencing 18-36 inches high with one-quarter inch mesh partially buried and tilted away from the protected area has been effective. No chemical controls are available to repel snakes. An interesting statistic concerning snakes is that during the period of 1958-1981, 7 people in North Carolina died from snake bites while 133 people were killed by lightning.
