

The Capitol of North Carolina, a beautiful building dating from 1833, flew the Confederate flag from 1861 until 1865 and continues to do so today—on May 10, Confederate Memorial Day. The secession ordinance was adopted here on May 20, 1861, and was celebrated by firing 100 guns on Capital Square. Later saltpetre for manufacture of gunpowder was stored in the rotunda. General Sherman occupied this Capitol on April 14, 1865, on his march from Bentonville, the bloodiest battle fought in the State, to the Bennett House near Durham. There he received General Joseph E. Johnston's surrender of the last major field army of the Confederacy on April 26, 1865—17 days after Lee's surrender at Appomatox. The Capitol is open to visitors, and has an information desk in operation during State office hours.

A gem of early military architecture, Fort Macon played an important role in the Civil War and is today restored as a State Park adjacent to popular Atlantic Beach. Note the heavy gun emplacements visible in this aerial photograph, which also shows the moat and drawbridge common to fortifications of its period. Note also the tiny figures of people approaching on the path in the lower center to gain an idea of the size of this fort, standing at the entrance to the Morehead City-Beaufort harbor. Fort Macon was completed in 1834 and was garrisoned during four wars—the Civil War, the Spanish American War and World Wars I and II. Confederate forces manned the fort after hostilities began in 1861, but lost it to Union troops sweeping down the coast from the north on April 25, 1862. Thereafter the port of Morehead, with its railroad into the interior, was closed to the Confederacy.
