Need to Exercise Care in Storage Of Canned Foods

Take a look at your canned products. Do your fruits and vegetables still have their bright color or do they look pale and unappetizing?

Proper storage is an important point to consider for any conserved food—whether home or commercially canned. Miss Iola Pritchard, food conservation and marketing specialist for the N. C. Agricultural Extension Service, says canned foods should be stored in a dry, cool place and it should be reasonably dark if glass containers are used.

She says extreme moisture may cause metal cans and closures to rust thus shortening the shelf life of the product.

"High storage temperatures should be avoided," Miss Pritchard adds. "They may not affect the wholesomeness of the product but they tend to impair color and flavor of some foods. Freezing may cause the cans to burst or break the seal. Too much light, especially on glass jars, will cause fading and discoloration of the canned product. This within itself is not an indication of spoilage, but it does make the product less attractive and often affects the texture of the food."

If adequate storage is available the shopper may save money by taking advantage of specials and by quantity buying. Convenience in having easy-to-prepare canned foods available is important since it may mean the difference between a well-balanced meal and "just food" for the family.
