expense, regardless of the family makeup.

The employed wives used some of their earnings to upgrade their wardrobes. Obviously, this was necessary to permit the wife to appear suitably dressed on the job.

The family economists found that by far the largest single job-related expense was income tax. Transportation to and from work was also a major item. After these and other job-related expenses had been deducted, net incomes of the Ohio wives ranged from about half of their total income for mothers of preschool children to more than 60 per cent for wives in households of adults or of adults and older children.

Seven out of every 10 wives pooled their net income with that of their husbands, two handled it separately, and one pooled part and kept part. The younger wives were more likely to pool their earnings than the older ones---perhaps because the pressure on family income was greater in these growing families.

The uses reported for the unpooled earnings divided into four approximately equal categories: To provide furnishings, equipment, or other household improvements; to help with
