nizes that the child's needs, not the desires of his parents, must invariably come first during the early years.

It is natural for parents to want to shower their baby with affection and attention--display him and otherwise give vent to their great satisfaction in his growth and development.

This must not be at the expense of the routine so necessary to the development of good health and good habits. There is plenty of opportunity to enjoy one's child without sacrificing this routine.

for himself. Whether or not he will enjoy his newer accomplishments is largely dependent on the mother's attitude. And it's a wise New Bern mother (and father) who recog-

New Bern mothers will do well to keep in mind that the most successful mother is the one who knows what may be reasonably expected of her child, and makes it possible for him to meet this expectation. Too often, say the experts, mothers so regret the passing of the period of infancy that they encourage the retention of infantile habits. The child who is treated as an infant longer than he should be will remain an infant longer than necessary. Mothers can avoid this tendency if they realize not only that they must be proud of the child's growth and change but that they too must grow and change. The mother must be able to give up the early delightful situation in which her tiny infant is so completely dependent, for a relationship changing with the child's growth.

This new relationship will prove to be no less satisfying, in its way, than the first. Here the satisfaction, for both the mother and the child, lies in the fact that the small child begins to accomplish things for himself. Physically and mentally he becomes capable of doing things
