

TOT TALK

Few adults speak eloquently in their way to day conversations, but small children have a picturesque speech all their own.

For example, four year old Tommy was up in arms when he came into the kitchen and found his father sawing a plank to repair a cabinet.

In the tattle-tale manner so typical of youngsters he yelled to high heaven, "Mommy, look at the mess Daddy is making! He's got board crumbs all over the floor."

Then there's the story of the tot who was slow graduating from his stroller. One day his aunt was taking care of him. They came to a street crossing that was rather bumpy, and she invited him to get out and cross the thoroughfare under his own steam.

Fixing the aunt with a disdainful glare, he smirked and said, "The folks that own me don't make me walk."

Still another lad of tender years (five to be exact) just couldn't seem to learn the intricacies of buttoning his clothes. He was able to unbutton them easily enough, but the reverse procedure stumped him.

Finally disgusted, he told his mother, "I can button up, but I can't button down." It was an unique way to express his plight, but with a mother's wisdom she knew exactly what he meant.

This story appeals to us, as it probably will to you. Little Edith came home from kindergarten at noon, and found her mother engaged in a prolonged ed telephone conversation with her neighbor.

The little girl waited for twenty minutes or more, then tiptoed to her mother's side. "If they ask about me," she whispered, "tell them I'm waiting for lunch."

When our own Jo Carole, now a proud mother herself, was a tot she invariably ate the center portion of a piece of toast, leaving the outside crust intact.

Told that the crust was tasty too, she replied, "I don't like the bones."
