TRACKER . . . Second Lieutenant Susan L. Breeden is one of several orbital analysts assigned to the United States Air Force Defense Command's Space Defense Center in Cheyenne Mountain near Colorado Springs, Colo. Using computers, the analysts track all space objects, including the Apollo 15 module which joined more than 2,400 payloads and pieces of debris orbiting the earth in late July.

IN NEW BERN TODAY

The ability to talk easily with others can be developed, if you're willing to work at it. Sincerity breaks through, like the morning sun, and it counts for a lot. Spotting the absence of it isn't difficult.

Being witty, and well informed on a variety of subjects, will make you welcome in any group. IF you don't boast and hog the conversation. Your tongue shouldn't wag constantly, give someone else a chance to speak up.

What the world needs, when people get together, are more good listeners. Some of the most popular individuals you'll ever meet have won the hearts of many associates by showing interest in what they say.

It is irritating when you interrupt someone else, or clearly indicate that you're chiefly concerned with what you're going to say next. All of us know people who are obviously not keeping track of what you're saying.

The fault is so widespread that you too are guilty of the same thing at least part of the time. Take stock the next time you're conversing in a group, and see how often you interrupt, or your mind strays.

Poking fun at yourself, rather than others, is an excellent way to make and keep friends. People react favorably toward a person who is willing to admit his or her shortcomings, and be the object of his own humor.

Think twice before you poke fun at the other fellow. Are you pointing out something for ridicule that the victim has no control over? Is it fair to heap humiliation on someone who audience drooled during this portion of the evening's bill of fare.

Later, onlookers were treated to a pageant, and what a pageant it was. Included in the array of talented performers were the seven Vestal Virgins, the Emperor Augustus, the Empress Livia, Marcus Antonius, Octavia, the Pontifex Maximus, Maecenas, Virgil, has a physical flaw that he, more than anyone else, is aware of?

It is neither clever nor original to single out the ugly duckling, and pick on him or her. You may inspire laughter on the part of those who are attractive, or better dressed, but is it worth a broken heart?

If you're physically attractive, or above the average in intelligence, you can't take credit for it. All you can take credit for is what you do with the capabilities you are blessed with.

Remember, as long as you live, that it isn't how far you go, but how far you came from.

Horace, Ovid, Cupid, Psyche, Julius Caesar, Calpurnia, Brutus, Mark Antony, and a nifty group of Persian dancers.

Romulus and Remus were on hand too, along with the she wolf that allegedly nourished then in infancy. The version of the myth portrayed by these Latin students was a revelation. Dressed swaddling clothes, and cradled in a paper boat, the twins howled like all get out for sustenance. Thereupon, the she wolf ankled out on stage with a bowl of cereal, and spooned them full of the stuff.

Caesar was bumped off in a most unusual manner. Instead of falling prey to an assortment of daggers, he was pounced upon by hoodlums with cap pistols. Even so, his extermination was accomplished.

Mark Antony's oration over Caesar's carcass gave a new twist to history too. Mark, smoking a cigar and toting a lily, stood on Caesar's tummy and said my heart is in the coffin with Caesar. "Your feet are in it too," complained the uncomfortable corpse.

Latin, way back when, was dead all right. As dead, that is, as two tomcats fighting on a galvanized roof.
