Any wife who was able to talk her husband out of watching last Sunday's Super Bowl game can gloat over the fact that the man at her house is henpecked beyond all recall. At best her victory is hollow, and won't make for a happier home.

At least the 75 million Americans who watched the Washington Redskins and Miami Dolphins in combat were staying out of mischief. For one thing, there were fewer people killing each other on usually busy highways.

Following every bit of action with extreme concentration kept that exasperating guy you live with from noticing how you've gained weight and added wrinkles, and wolfish notions about someone more glamorous weren't on his mind.

Whatever the reason, be thankful for the fact that your husband was finding enjoyment in his own home. Admittedly, home is mostly a place to get away from these days, but that's not the key to domestic bliss.

So you're married to a sports fanatic. Before you trade him in for a man who couldn't care less about gridiron heroics, take a long look at his replacement. Everybody is bound to be a nut about something.

Quite possibly you're a nut yourself about soap operas. During the week, while your husband isn't around, you drool over what is happening to Emily and George, or Sidney and Mary, for hours on end.

And likely as not you watch those idiotic game shows, day in and day out, where would be contestants arrive in crazy costumes, and squeal to high heaven. And of a night you turn your dial to a channel where you can play peeping Tilly in make believe hospital rooms. Morbid curiosity is obviously your thing.

Sports aren't altogether bad. Be glad that the money derived from Shrine Bowl games, and other charity contests, is responsible for the erection and maintenance of many multi-million hospitals.

And never forget that some of our greatest sports stars could have ended up hoodlums, and that athletic ability enables many a boy to go to college. Sports are here to stay. Next time let your guy forget his unimportance for a while, watching his team win gloriously.
