GRATITUDE

By THOMAS ARKLE CLARK
Dean of Men, University of Illinois.

I have no doubt that people in general feel a greater sense of appreciation or gratitude or whatever you are pleased to call it for the many favors or courtesies which they receive from the hands of their friends than they usually express. The Boy Scout is under obligation to do a grateful kind act daily. I believe it would be a fine thing to organize a society which should have as one of its tenets that each member orally or in writing should every day give expression to some words of gratitude for kind acts received. It is quite as much a duty to acknowledge a courtesy as it is to offer one. Nothing gives me more pleasure than the unexpected gratitude of some one to whom I have shown, consciously or unconsciously, some little attention.

For instance, I had in this morning's mail a letter from Dunken who has been out of college two years or so, and has in reality almost passed out of my memory, so slight was our acquaintance. I had indirectly been responsible for his getting a small loan in his senior year which tided him over a financial difficulty and kept him from leaving college before graduation. His note was to thank me for the service I had done him and to say how much the money had meant to him. He had met the obligation before it was due with the hope that some other unfortunate might be helped as he himself had been. I suppose I had officially and otherwise been able to help a hundred boys out of a hole who had taken the service as a routine attention to which they were entitled, but here was one who was grateful and who had expressed his gratitude.

I suppose there are reasons why more people do not do as Dunken did—carelessness, ignorance, laziness, procrastination—you can name a few yourself, but be that as it may, it is a good business procedure to make acknowledgements; it cements friendships, it gives the people pleasure who have shown us the attention, and often it suggests to them the obligation to do the same things.

Gratitude sincerely expressed is a lubricant which tremendously aids the smooth running of all sorts of social and business machinery.

NOTICE

TO TAXPAYERS OF HALIFAX COUNTY

The county tax books for the year 1930 have been in the hands of tax collectors since October 1, 1930. If you have not paid your taxes, see the tax collector in your township and pay at once.

Under the present State Laws, tax collectors are required to force collection of all taxes that are now unpaid.

As required by Section 4, Chapter 213, Public Laws of 1927, real estate will be advertised for sale on first day of May. Pay your taxes before this date and save this additional cost.

The State Laws do not allow the Board of County Commissioners or Sheriff any discretion in these matters.
