

Tobacco Gets More Acres

Tobacco farmers of North Carolina are expected to devote approximately 816,000 acres this year to the production of flue-cured and burley leaf, says the Federal-State Crop Reporting Service in the N. C. Agriculture Department.

If intentions are followed, the acreage this season will be nine per cent larger than in 1945 in the flue-cured belts and 10 per cent smaller in the burley tobacco regions.

In releasing the estimate, Russell Handy, crop statistician, explained that the information was based on a careful survey made in all tobacco producing areas of the State. He said that all indications point to flue-cured tobacco farmers' attempting to take full advantage of the increased quota of 10 per cent.

"No doubt some farmers will overplant their allotments, but others will not plant their full quotas," said Handy.

In the Old and Middle belts, farmers report that they plan to increase their crop by the full 10 per cent, which would raise the acreage to 315,000 from the 286,000 acres planted in tobacco last season.

In Eastern North Carolina growers say they plan to increase their acreage by nine per cent, planting 385,000 acres in flue-cured tobacco as compared with 353,000 in 1945.

Down in the Border Belt, the acreage is expected to go to 92,000 acres, or eight per cent more than last season.

Handy said that the relatively poor prices received by most burley producers during the season just closed and the reduction by 10 per cent in the national allotment for this type of tobacco have caused burley producers to reduce their acreage.
