BETTER SPEECH WEEK IS OBSERVED WITH NOVEL PROGRAMS IN CHAPEL

and oftentimes silence. In other words, be simple, direct, and sincere. Your speech will prove your true character." At each of the three chapel exercises Helen Felder's prize play, "The Conqueror," was presented. Martha Broadhurst and Bob Stone, as the wise and good rulers of the Land of Fair Speech; Margaret Irvin as Complex Sentence, the beautiful vampire; and Vernell Hackney as Compound Sentence, were all in their native elements. Julius Witten as Simple Sentence kept the audience in a constant uproar. The skillful manipulation of Simple's neckpiece was fully appreciated. Applause was instantly forthcoming at each wiggle. The performance of Michaux Crocker as Student was near perfect. The Student by overcoming every obstacle to Good Speech eventually became the Conqueror. Elizabeth Hodgin recited "Miss Good English," her clever parody on "Little Orphan Annie."

In addition to the chapel exercises, the English classes carried on work pertaining to Better Speech; each member of the various classes was required to make a Better Speech poster. The results were surprising, for a quantity of hidden talent was brought to light. The posters were placed in every vacant space at the High School where the students were permitted to admire them. The best of these were later moved to the Greensboro Book Store. A prize was offered by the Torchlight Society for the best play concerning Better Speech. Helen Felder's "The Conqueror" won first place. Betty Harrison, president of the society, presented the prize, a collection of Tennyson's poems, on Friday in the presence of the student body.

John Stone and Edwyn Bennett; and the reader, Lois Gillespie. Between scenes of the play, Dorothy Mayes, Margaret Crews, Elizabeth Crews and Inez Murray, in colonial costumes, gracefully danced an old-fashioned minuet. At the conclusion of the program the social committee served delicious fudge and mints. The best way to kill time is to work it to death.
