

Deforestation: Are we out of the woods yet?

BY CHRONIC COMPLAINER

Today's society faces many issues, but there is one heinous crime that tops the list in terms of depravity: deforestation. While many of us drive around, sipping our Starbucks Coffee in our Hummer H2s, there are just as many people in South America drinking cocoa liqueur and kicking baby leopards in the stomach. These scoundrels make a living destroying the habitats of countless adorable piranhas, sloths and pythons, in addition to some environmental problems that scientists have complained about enough that they do not need to be reiterated here.

Disforestation is wrong. How can we allow this suffering to continue, to destroy our environment? Fortunately, there is an easy solution.

It is a well known fact that there are at least 106 sloths, 117 tree frogs, and approximately 43 leopards per square mile of rainforest. If the rainforest were to be destroyed by something that is not human, such as a fire, then there would be an average of 92 roasted sloths, 54 baked tree frogs, and 32 immolated leopards. These are completely acceptable casualties, by any means.

Thousands of square miles of farmland would also be cleared of the oppressive rainforest flora, providing jobs for homeless pygmy tribes (their silly huts burned to the ground). Not only would we be saving adorable leopard kittens, but we would also be housing the homeless and stimulating the local economy.

Clearly, the only solution to deforestation is to eliminate the forest altogether. It is my modest proposal that we burn it to the ground. Only then will the leopard sleep in peace.

Recently McDoogle's has joined the organization called "Fighting Unhealthy Children in America," Michelle Obama's new children's obesity awareness program. However, the company wishes to assure its most loyal consumers, err... customers, that their low prices will continue to thrive and include new and improved healthier options.

"Customers have, overall, enjoyed the French fried grasshoppers, now on the dollar menu," said manager Maria Carlos Vepsata from the Unfriendly Center location. "For those willing to pay a little more change, then our McMeal worms and chocolate-covered ants are also quite the rage this month."

In light of the recent Toyota recalls, CEO Aiko Toyoda made a monumental announcement to the public on March 31, 2010.

"I am deeply shamed by the state of my family's business and the trouble I have brought upon the world," said Toyoda. "However, I will not go into hiding, as my archnemesis, Tanakobu Ito, CEO of Honda, suggested. Instead, I will close down all plants and follow my childhood dream I lost due to family pressure to take on the business. I will be a rock star."

Following his farewell speech, Toyoda preceded to cut and dye his hair, undergo lasik eye surgery, and pierce his ears. A few hours later, a picture was posted on Toyoda's Mixi Account (Japan's MySpace equivalent), revealing his new look. A caption followed the photograph:

"How do you like my cool look, youngins? Kekeke. Look for my next single to be released through Axev Records-- Smells Like Lady Speed Stick!"

The Toyoda family remains shocked over the matter.

"Toyoda has acted dishonorably," said Hitsubatsu Mashigato, the family patriarch, in a press conference late last night.

Look for Aiko Toyoda's new album to hit stores in Japan next week!
