

Service Initiatives

by: David Angeles

If you ask an ASA member about something interesting they had done this past semester, you may be shocked to hear something along the lines of “flinging dead chickens over a 12-foot fence to feed hungry tigers.” This may indeed sound strange, but early in September ASA was one of many student groups to participate in the university’s annual day of service called Project UNC, or PUNC. Our assignment: Pitt County’s Carnivore Preservation Trust. It was wild, it was fun and yes folks, it really stunk! A committed group of about 18 members came out to not only feed the tigers, but to help in the “ASA can help the community and demonstrate our dedication to service, group identity and philanthropy.”

ABOVE: A lounging leopard at CPT.