

Here And There Around S. J. Field

Writing rooms and facilities are many and varied on Seymour Johnson, but here is one to rank with the best of them—the back of the 791st Squadron's Day room. Note the adequate space and lighting facilities.

When a GI's folks come to visit him at Seymour Johnson Field it's a pretty happy occasion. So was this one, shown in a picture taken at the Guest House. Left to right: Joseph Schwartz, the father; Leola Schwartz, the sister; Pfc. Dellmar Schwartz, the GI, and his mother, Mrs. Schwartz. Dellmar is with the 797th TSS. The family is from Watertown, Wis. Joe Schwartz and his daughter, Leola, work for a concern which manufactures shoes for the Army.

We don't know the name of this GI but if he is married—well, we could say, "If his wife could see him now he'd never get to the office or his job on Mondays." However, perhaps he learned that professional touch (clutch on the clothespin) in the Army.

Supply sergeants, even the WACs have 'em. Here is Opl. Carmel Chirumbolo, really the supply sergeant for Seymour Johnson Field's WAC detachment, counting up the blankets. She had not had time to sew on her new set of stripes when this picture was taken.

Into the Camouflage area of Seymour Johnson go students of the art of concealment, and passing through the gate they can march proudly under the sign: "Through This Portal Pass the Finest Soldiers in the World."

One way to learn plane identification is demonstrated by the day room of the 791st Squadron. The boys, during off duty hours, have put together these plane likenesses on a government pattern. Sitting in a chair you can look up and see what it would be like to visualize a Zero or a Heinkel at 300 feet. The group in the background is pointing at the model of a B-17.

When the Post/Orchestra tests on these big horns and little ones, and the boys really start getting in the proverbial groove, the seals at the Service Club are filled. It's a mighty solid organization, and if you don't think so, drop down some time when they're giving out...
