The Facts Behind The News

By Rodney Waters

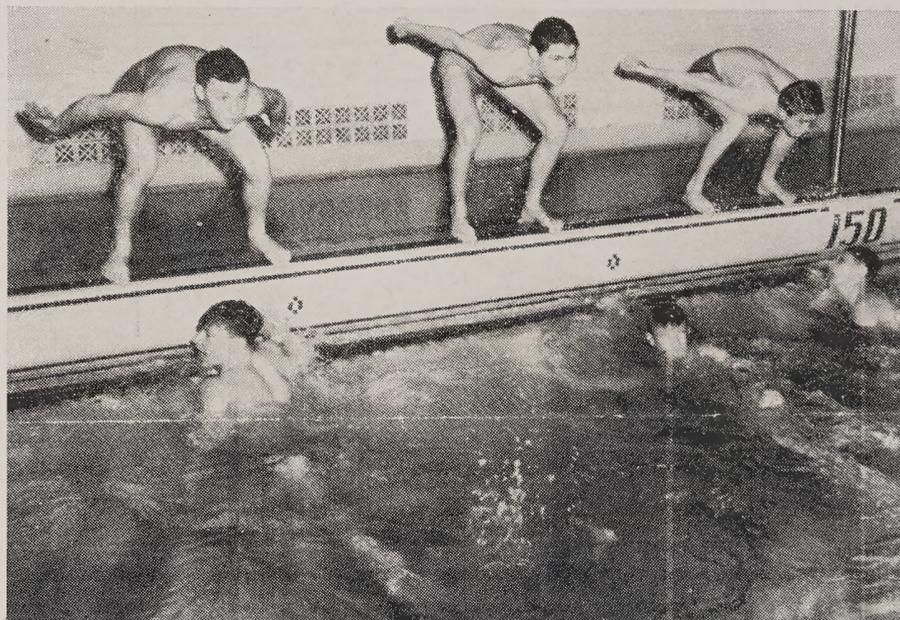

Disappearance of the German Navy

As we follow the adventures of the Scharnhorst we will see generally what happened to the other ships of the German Navy, even though their history might not have been as spectacular.

On October 3, 1936, a great crowd was gathered in Germany's great navy yard at Wilhelmshaven to witness the launching of the great battleship Scharnhorst which was the first German battleship to be launched in two decades and was the start of the new navy of that country. Shortly after this, her sister ship, Gneisenau was sent roaring into the water.

In 1939 Germany attacked Poland and Britain entered the war as an ally of Poland, but there were already German submarines all around England and there were several cruisers in the English shipping lanes. The first appearance of the Scharnhorst was in the Skagerrak but this was merely a trick to bring British forces within range of German based bombers and it failed. She was next seen with two cruisers escorting the troopship Bremen from a port in North Russia. The British submarine which first sighted these ships thought she was out of range but the two German cruisers swerved right into range and by the time the submarine had finished her attack the two ships were severely damaged.
