

KILLDEER'S ROCKY NEST —

While working near the solvent recovery system of Film Division's Pisgah Forest plant, David Glenn of Ecusta Maintenance was attracted by the odd behavior of a killdeer that would run, chirp and feign injury whenever anyone walked near a certain spot. Only after the intruder had left would the bird becalm its ruffled feathers. His curiosity up, Glenn followed the bird's return to that spot one day, only to get too close. It went through its antics again, pretending to have a broken wing, in an obvious effort to draw Glenn away from the pecan-size eggs camouflaged against the gravel nest. Glenn said that shortly thereafter the chicks hatched and disappeared the same day.

TOWARD A HAPPIER RETIREMENT —

Preparing to make the transition successfully to a happy retirement, employees in the 59-65 age bracket and their spouses have responded enthusiastically to the pre-retirement seminars at Pisgah Forest, believed to be the first conducted by an industry in Western North Carolina. The initial group is shown in these photos listening to Harold Carrick of Hendersonville, one of the many resource persons who spoke on a wide variety of topics. As the second seminar neared completion, plans were underway for the third session to begin in August.
