IF Bob Meusel is traded to the Chicago White Sox, he will be a 50 per cent better player than he was with the Yankees.

Bob Meusel should be one of the greatest stars in the game, whereas he is just in the ordinary class. Meusel's greatest fault is lack of ambition. Baseball is anything but a serious proposition with him. Bob Meusel has much more ability than his brother, Emil, of the Giants, yet he isn't nearly so valuable a player.

Huggins lacked the ability to make Meusel a fighter. Meusel needs a manager who will constantly prod him when he falls down. With Huggins his failures were usually overlooked without so much as an exhortation.

If Meusel goes to Chicago he will find Kid Gleason a much different individual than Manager Huggins. Gleason is convincing—Huggins just the opposite.

Woe to any ball player who fails to do what Gleason tells him to do. Gleason runs the Chicago club, and the sooner a player finds out that fact the better it will be for him.

With New York, Meusel did just about as he pleased. He might be told to sacrifice, but if he decided that he hit-and-run play was more proper, that is what he would attempt.

Then again, Gleason has a kindly way of appealing to a player that will cause him to put forth his best efforts. If such a method fails, Gleason, despite his 50 years and then some, is still able to physically chastise any player who will not respond to gentlemanly treatment.

Some people seem to think they are doing wrong by living.
